As one member of the majority in this House, I do not believe that the amount of appropriation brought in in the present bill from the Naval Committee necessarily should be less than it would be if there were authorization for two Dreadnoughts in that bill. I believe that the appropriation ought to be made for these auxiliary vessels for the Navy, in order that it may be brought up to the standard of efficiency and effectiveness in case we need it, and my remarks are warranted by the statement of the Secretary of the Navy as to the present needs of the Navy.

Then there is another reason why it is not, in my judgment, a proper policy to authorize at this time additional battleships, and that was referred to awhile ago in connection with the retirement of certain efficient vessels now in the Navy in order that the officers and men might be used upon new vessels.

The Secretary of the Navy says in his report that it would take 4,000 additional men to effectively man the vessels that are now effective in the American Navy. In a letter addressed to me by the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, dated February 23, the statement is made that to effectively man with officers and men the present available fighting vessels in the American Navy would require 18,500 men in addition to those now in the service.

We might just as well be sensible about this matter, and if you apply common sense to a program, whether it be a naval program or any other, how can you justify the authorization of the construction of additional battleships when we have not the men to put them in commission without retiring from the Navy vessels practically of equal efficiency? [Applause.] And so, in my judgment, the action taken by the Democratic caucus, which has been so much criticized by our friends on the other side of the aisle, is justified by the facts as furnished by the Navy Department itself to the President and by him to the House. If the Navy of the United States is for anything, it is for defense, and if it can be justified to the American people along any line of argument, it is for the defense of America and Americans. I do not believe that the policy that is proclaimed in some quarters, and earnestly proclaimed at a meeting held in this city recently by those interested in the extension of our fighting force, that we are to become the great international policeman of the universe, that it should be the policy of the American people, through their Navy, to settle all the petty disputes of all the petty nations that are scattered over the face of the earth. For this reason the enlargement of the Navy, in my judgment, could not be justified to the American people; but I do believe that its justification is easy along the line of national defense, and I believe the action taken by the majority of this House in limiting the present bill and cutting out of it any appropriation for battleships is not only wise, so far as the Navy is concerned, but so far as the country itself is concerned, and for the best interests of the Navy itself. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, how much time did the gentleman use?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman used 11 minutes.

Mr. SHERLEY. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 25 minutes remaining.

Mr. SHERLEY. I yield that 25 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. Clark]. [Applause.]

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I beg the indulgence of the committee for a short while in order that I may submit some observations which, while not pertinent to the bill under consideration, may nevertheless prove of some interest to my colleagues. I have tried during my service in this great body to consume as little of its time as possible consistent with my conception of my duty to the country as a whole and to the magnificent district which I have the distinguished honor to represent upon this floor. Believing that you will concede this claim, I make bold to impose myself on your good nature with some reflections upon my own course since I came among you.

Mr. Chairman, it is a very great honor to be a Representative in the Congress of the United States. It is a very much greater honor to deserve to be a Representative in the Congress of the United States. Every man upon this floor, no matter what his political faith may be, has been sent here by the free and untrammelled majority vote of more than 200,000 free, liberty-loving American citizens, and I submit that to be thus selected from among one's fellows is an honor worthy the ambition of any man. Under our form of government this body has come to be known as the "popular branch" of the legislative department, because of the fact that our Members are selected by direct vote of the people and come fresh from the great masses every two years. By virtue of this wise plan of the "fathers," if a Representative in Congress prove recreant to his trust, demonstrate his incapacity, or does not faithfully reflect the views of his constituency, he can speedily be replaced by another, and in my judgment he should be, as I hold to the opinion that no man should hold a commission to a seat on this floor unless he can in good faith truly reflect the views and register the wishes of the people who sent him here.

It is my well-considered and deliberate judgment, Mr. Chairman, that it is the solemn duty of a Member of Congress to faithfully and at all times and in every official act truly and to the best of his ability represent the wishes of his immediate constituency, and if in the course of his service he reaches a point where he can not conscientiously do so, he should at once return the commission he holds to those who intrusted it to him in order that his people may not be denied that just and true representation in this great body to which they are entitled. Our respective constituencies have the right to demand this of us, and no Member has the right—legal, equitable, moral, or political—to substitute the wishes of himself or any other man or any set of men for the wishes of his constituency. Now, I do not wish to be misunderstood right here. I do not mean to intimate that there should be no concert of action between members of the same political faith. I am a party man. I am an organization party man. I believe in organization and in party discipline, but under my oath as a Member of Congress, if the wishes of my constituents on a matter of importance to them should conflict with the wishes of my party associates, I would not be worthy of a seat here if I did not obey the views and wishes of those I represent. The Democratic Party, to which I belong, as represented in this House, has recognized and approved the principle for which I contend, and has clearly and unequivocally enunciated it in the rules governing the party caucus. Rule 7 of the Democratic caucus reads as follows:

Rule 7. In deciding upon action in the House involving party policy or principle, a two-thirds vote of those present and voting at a caucus meeting shall bind all members of this caucus; provided, the said two-thirds vote is a majority of the full Democratic membership of the House; and provided further, that no Member shall be bound upon questions involving a construction of the Constitution of the United States, or upon which he made contrary pledges to his constituents prior to his election, or received contrary instructions by resolution or platform from his nominating authority.

This rule is right. It clearly and distinctly blazes the way which the conscientious and faithful legislator should travel. Although, Mr. Chairman, I may not have "fought a good fight," thank God, I believe that I can truthfully claim that during my humble service in Congress I have "kept the faith" with my people and obeyed their will, even though on one or two occasions I have seemed to be at cross purposes with a majority of my party associates. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, during my service here I have witnessed the most marvelous development of our common country. During the past eight years we have grown as never before for a similar period in the history of the Republic. In the material upbuilding of the country millions have been added to our taxable values; tremendous advance has been made along all lines of human activity; our great rivers and harbors have been wonderfully improved; manufacturing establishments have been multiplied amazingly; agriculture has revived and is fast regaining its former position of supreme importance in our affairs, while our population has increased more rapidly than ever before in our history for a like time. I feel like congratulating myself on having had the privilege to witness and play some little part in this great forward movement. I am proud of the fact that my own beloved State of Florida has been no laggard in this glorious march of progress. Blessed by the Creator with an incomparable climate; with a soil as rich and productive as the world-famed "Valley of the Nile"; with a seacoast of more than twelve hundred miles; with inexhaustible mines and magnificent forests; with such a diversity of agricultural and horticultural products as can be found in no other Commonwealth, and, above all, peopled with as intelligent, energetic, and patriotic a citizenship as inhabits the earth, it is not surprising that Florida has kept step to the music of our advancing and progressive civilization. [Applause.] The census returns for 1910 give to the State of Florida a population of 752,619 people as against a population of 528,542 in 1900, which is an increase of 42.4 per cent, and which establishes the fact that only 11 States have made a greater comparative gain than Florida, while Florida made a greater percentage of gain than any other Southern State.

In 1900 the second congressional district of Florida, which I have the honor to represent on this floor, had a population of 210,337 people, and by the census of 1910 that district had a population of 286,911 people, showing a gain of 36.4 per cent. Mr. Chairman, as evidencing the growth of that district since I came to Congress I desire to submit a few facts.

On the 4th day of March, 1905, when I began my first term as a Member of Congress, there was only one Federal building in all that district, and that one was located at Jacksonville, the largest city in the State. To-day, in addition to the Jacksonville building, there is at the city of Fernandina a handsome Federal building costing the sum of $100,000; there is at the city of Gainesville a magnificent Government building which cost $150,000; $175,000 has been appropriated for the purchase of a site and the construction of a Federal building at the city of Miami; $52,500 has been appropriated for the purchase of a site and the construction of a Government building at the city of Live Oak; $63,000 has been appropriated for the purchase of a site and the construction of a Government building at the city of Palatka; $5,000 has been appropriated for the purchase of a site for a Government building at the city of De Land, and $5,000 has been appropriated for the purchase of a site for a Government building at the city of Orlando, aggregating the sum of $550,500 for sites and Federal buildings for seven cities in my district. [Applause.]

RURAL MAIL ROUTES.

During my service in Congress, realizing the very great importance of better mail service for our rural population, I have taken the greatest possible interest in the extension of the rural mail service, with a result like this:

When I entered upon my duties as a Representative I found but 15 rural mail routes in operation in the second congressional district of Florida. These routes gave employment to only 15 men, and there was being paid out annually in the district on account of this service only $7,670. Thousands of my constituents were getting no benefit from this most beneficent branch of the postal service, and I immediately set about to extend it, so that our farming population, so far as possible, might have equal mail benefits with those who dwell in cities. The result, Mr. Chairman, has been that to-day there are 86 rural mail routes in operation in my district, giving employment to 86 men and paying out on account of the service $75,032 annually. There has been paid out in my district on account of rural mail service during my terms in Congress approximately the sum of $395,250. There are pending in the department at this time 23 applications for the establishment of that number of additional rural mail routes.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

The river and harbor projects in my district are numerous and important. During the seven years that I have been a Member of this House there has been appropriated for river and harbor improvements a total sum approximating $3,000,000. [Applause.] In addition to this a lightship, to be constructed and placed at the entrance of the St. Johns River, at a cost of $125,000, has been authorized by Congress, and it will soon be a reality, much to the benefit of seagoing craft in that part of our waters. In addition to these, other appropriations, such as for the eradication of the white fly, the destruction of the water hyacinth, for the Weather Bureau, etc., have been made, aggregating a considerable sum of money, which, with pensions paid out annually in the district, aggregate about $1,000,000 a year.

Mr. Chairman, it is far from my purpose to claim entire credit for these great appropriations, which the marvelous growth of the great district I represent imperatively demanded. [Applause.] The different Senators from my State serving here during that time rendered full service in this regard, and my colleagues from Florida on this floor accorded to me every possible aid; but I do mean to claim that I was here on guard at this end of the Capitol and had a hand in every part and parcel of this glorious record of accomplishment. [Applause.]

During my service in Congress, Mr. Chairman, I have had the pleasure of seeing more than 40 of the bills I have introduced, fully half of them of a public nature, and some of them of great public importance, written into the law. The House of Representatives, in addition to being the greatest deliberative body on the earth, is the greatest school the world has ever known. The Member who applies himself to the work becomes a more valuable representative of the people with each year of service. With length of service he reaches the more valuable committee assignments, and, with the close friendship contracted by long association, he becomes more influential and powerful among his fellows. [Applause.] So vast are the ramifications of the various departments of this great Government, so complex are the many questions which demand the attention of the present-day lawmaker, and so intricate are the many problems thrust upon us for solution by our advancing civilization that the new Member of Congress, no matter how able or brilliant he may be, is forced to undergo a lengthy period of instruction before he is really fitted for the rendition of the best service to his constituency.

I am aware of the fact, Mr. Chairman, that here and there in our history are isolated cases of some bright star suddenly blazing upon the legislative firmament with dazzling radiance, but beyond the delightful memory of the beautiful halo encircling them history affords no record of substantial accomplishment for the good of mankind. [Applause.] There is in the history of this great body no record of sudden elevation to leadership or position of power and influence. Commanding positions here must come as the result of patient, laborious work and long service. Eliminating self entirely from consideration, and looking only to the good of the respective constituencies represented upon this floor, and to the good of the country at large, I do not hesitate to say that in my humble judgment frequent changes of membership in this body is more responsible for the enactment of bad legislation and the failure to enact good legislation than any other half dozen causes. [Applause.] Fortunately, indeed, is that constituency which, having secured the services of a faithful, studious, and energetic and watchful Representative, has the good sense to keep him here so long as he is willing to serve and render efficient service. [Applause.] He will make mistakes, because "to err is human," but if his heart is right and his mind is sound he will become more and more valuable to his people and his country as the years come and go. [Applause.] A seat in Congress is not simply an honor to be passed around among the citizens of the district simply as a compliment to worthy men. It is a position of responsibility and work, to be intrusted to one as the representative of many. When a Member of Congress speaks, he speaks for the thousands who chose him; when he acts he acts for the vast number of his neighbors and friends at home, and upon his voice, his vote, and his act depend in large measure the weal or woe of his district and his country. [Applause.]

My colleagues, a mighty responsibility rests upon us as the representatives of more than 90,000,000 citizens of this great Republic. God Almighty, in His wisdom and beneficence, has given us the grandest territory ever comprised within the boundaries of an earthly government; He has conferred upon us every possible need for man and beast; He has vouchsafed unto us the highest civilization the world has ever seen; and He has blessed us with His own holy religion. Let us be careful with this mighty responsibility. Let us legislate with an eye single to the betterment of the condition of all our people and the prosperity and glory of our common country, keeping ever in mind as the chart for our guidance that glorious and eternal doctrine of "equal justice to all, special privileges to none." [Applause.] Do this, and whether the ship of state be riding peacefully at anchor or breasting a tempestuous sea, we can safely—

Nail to the mast the tattered flag,
Set every threadbare sail;
Give her to the God of storm,
The lightning, and the gale.

[Loud and continued applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, this bill comes to the House with a unanimous report from the Committee on Appropriations. Every item has been agreed to unanimously by the committee, and, while I may differ somewhat from the chairman of the subcommittee on fortifications, I want to say that the carefulness with which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] entered upon the investigation of the various items that compose this bill and the patriotism with which he acted upon every item ought to commend itself not only to the Members of this House but to the country as well. [Applause.] There are policies provided for in this bill in which I do not concur. I believe that officers in the Army and in the Navy are most generous when it comes to spending the people's money. But they are no more generous in the expenditure of money in the purchase of armament, ordnance, and ordnance stores in times of peace than they are in their willingness to shed their own blood if the honor of the country were at stake. [Applause.] I believe, however, that in appropriation bills of this kind that Congress should say what the policy of the Government should be regarding the purchase and manufacture of armament and of ordnance and ordnance stores. I shall insert in the Record a statement made by Gen. Crozier, the Chief of Ordnance, in his report to the Secretary of War in 1910, showing the extent to which the Government now manufactures armament and ordnance and ordnance stores in the five principal arsenals belonging to the Government.

It is a familiar argument that it costs the Government a good deal more than it costs private individuals or concerns to manufacture like articles. I concur in all that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] has said with regard to the ability of the Chief of Ordnance, Gen. Crozier, as a manufacturer. He has proven that in every instance, with one or two exceptions, where the Government undertook the manufacture of ordnance or ordnance stores, armament, guns, and cannon, their carriages, and so forth, that it has manufactured them cheaper than it could purchase the same articles. In the report of the Chief of Ordnance for 1906, Gen. Crozier makes a showing giving in detail the comparative cost of ordnance and ordnance stores purchased under contract and manufactured at the Government arsenals. This showing is as follows:

Again in the same report the Chief of Ordnance observes that while he is manufacturing cheaper than he can purchase like articles he does so under difficulties not experienced by private manufacturers. He says:

In comparing Government manufacture with that at private establishments certain advantages characterize each method. The private manufacturer is not restricted to eight hours of labor per day. This may or may not be an advantage, but there is no doubt the advantage resulting from a relief from the necessity of paying for 15 days of vacation per year, for national holidays, and for Saturday half holidays during the summer months.

In a like report for the year 1909 is a statement showing the difference in the cost of manufacturing and the contract price for ordnance and ordnance stores and armament. In the table given below it will be observed that in but one instance is the arsenal cost greater than the contract price:

Comparative cost of ordnance and ordnance stores purchased under contract and manufactured at arsenals (1909 report).

² Average under 4 contracts, same date and amount.

Again, in the report of 1911 the Chief of Ordnance gives the comparative cost at the arsenal and under contract. A few days ago, in conversation with him, he handed me a report which shows a still greater difference in the cost of certain guns over the cost of manufacturing at the arsenal. It is as follows:

Some comparative costs of manufacture at Government arsenals and private plants.

Articles.	Costs.
	At arsenals.	By contract.	Difference.
			Per cent.
3-inch gun carriages, each.....	$2,510.60	$3,398.82	35.3
3-inch limbers, each.....	689.22	1,568.47	127.5
3-inch caissons, each.....	1,128.67	1,744.10	54.5
Caliber .30 ball cartridges, per M.....	26.95	35.80	32.8

The total saving to the Government by manufacture at the arsenal, from the above figures, on the vehicles mentioned, which do not constitute the entire equipment, averages 55 per cent of the arsenal cost.

The contract prices taken were in each case for vehicles produced by manufacturers who had previously fabricated large numbers of the vehicles in question and who were consequently possessed of the necessary experience as well as of the tools, jigs, fixtures, etc.

Notwithstanding the fact that the cost to the Government by contract over Government manufacture ranges from 32.8 to 127.5 per cent more, yet the Government by this bill—by the Army appropriation bill which we have just passed and, I have no doubt, by the Navy bill—we will continue a policy of permitting a great deal of this work to be done by private contract. I would not complain of this policy if we were at this time operating our arsenals at anything like full capacity. But that is not the case. The Watervliet Arsenal has a capacity, so I am informed, for working 700 men. In 1905 it employed 496 men, in 1906 it employed 377 men, in 1907 it employed 322 men, in 1908 it employed 377 men, in 1909 it employed 341 men, in 1910 it employed 249 men, and in April, 1911, according to the report of the Chief of Ordnance, they were only employing in that arsenal, with a capacity of 700 men, 214 men. This, too, notwithstanding the fact that by increasing the number of men up to the capacity of the arsenal we could save for the Government large sums of money by manufacturing our armaments, ordnance, and ordnance stores.

The same thing, only in a lesser degree, prevails at Rock Island. The arsenal there in 1907 employed 1,671 men; last year it employed 1,568 men.

I hold in my hand a copy of a letter written by the Secretary of the Navy to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DE FOREST] with regard to the matter of purchasing guns. He says:

The department has recently awarded the Bethlehem Steel Co. and the Midvale Steel Co. contracts for the manufacture of twenty-five 4-inch guns at a price of $7,000 per gun. It is estimated that it would cost the department $5,400 per gun if this work were done in the Watervliet Arsenal.

I will not read the rest of the letter. I only read this much to show that this is the policy of the Government. If we could save $1,600 per gun on a contract of 25 guns by manufacturing them at an arsenal that is run at present at less than one-third of its capacity, why not do so. I do not desire to criticize in the slightest degree the motives that prompt officers of the Army and officers of the Navy in following along the lines that they have been following, for I can well recognize their position in this regard and the motives that prompt them to follow that policy. But, after all, it is for Congress to say whether or not we shall train men in our arsenals who will be available when the time comes, if it ever should come, that we shall need increased armament, an increase in ordnance and ordnance stores, or whether we shall train men in private manufacturing plants, at the expense of the Government arsenal. Is it not just as patriotic to adopt a policy for the Government to have those trained men working in its arsenals as it is for private manufacturers to have trained men to do this same class of work for which the private manufacturer exacts a rather large return?

I realize the fact that these private manufacturers are at the same time asking for contracts. And, mind you, this is not the kind of a contract that affects the manufacturers generally. The Government of the United States is about the only customer who goes to a manufacturer and asks for cannon. The Government of the United States is about the only purchaser, and it can well be understood that it is a matter of conjecture as to how long the Government will continue this policy of purchasing its armament, and this makes the private manufacturer charge an apparently outrageous price for his product. In the hearing on this matter we went over the subject somewhat in detail with Gen. Crozier, Chief of Ordnance, and he stated to the committee that it was not the intention of the War Department to increase in any respect the number of men employed at the arsenals, but that it would be necessary to increase the contracts to private contractors. He said, "I should say that the amount of contract work given out would be at least double."

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentlemen from Iowa yield to the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. GOOD. I yield.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. The gentleman is a member of that committee?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Has there been any discussion before the committee of a project to establish a foundry at the local yard here?

Mr. GOOD. There was no discussion of that subject before the committee this year. There may have been some discussion of it in prior hearings. I do not know.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. As I understand it, the guns that are handled at these yards come to these local yards in the shape of rough castings. Is not that correct?

Mr. GOOD. The Chief of Ordnance did not go into the matter. I can not answer the gentleman as to that. I am not informed as to that matter.

A few days ago, when the Army appropriation bill was before the House, I had something to say on the question of the Powder Trust. After I had taken my seat I was called out of the Chamber, and my attention was not called to some remarks made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. AMES] until they appeared in the RECORD. I was in hopes he would be here to-day, for I told him I expected to discuss this bill and to refer to his remarks. I was amazed, when I came to read his remarks, to find that not only the accuracy of my statements was questioned, but the good faith and sincerity with which I made them was also questioned.

I was amazed beyond my power to explain that that statement should have been made by the gentleman from Massachusetts. I can recall that a few months ago, when the gentleman from Massachusetts, when the cotton bill was under discussion, said that he did not own stock and was not interested in cotton mills, but that members of his family did own stock and were interested in them. The other day, when the Army appropriation bill was before the House, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. AMES] said that he did not own stock in ammunition concerns, but that members of his family did.

I want to raise the question now and have it settled once for all that not on the floor of this House, while I am a Member of it at least, will I have my integrity impugned by a man who stands here not as a Representative, but as a person representing members of his family who are stockholders in concerns that would receive dividends under contracts that might be awarded. I believe that Members on the floor of this House should represent an American constituency, a constituency of men, and not a constituency of family members demanding dividends earned on Government contracts. [Applause.]

It was also suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. AMES] that there was no Ammunition Trust. It is true that amendments offered to the Army appropriation bill referred to ammunition. Everybody who knows anything about ordnance and ordnance stores must know that every bit of ammunition has more or less of powder in it, and these appropriation bills have come to the House for a long time containing language providing for the "manufacture and purchase of ammunition," not of powder. Under that provision the Chief of Ordnance is permitted to buy powder, as he is permitted to buy other ammunition. And so, if we are going to regulate a monopoly such as the Powder Trust, I submit that we must regulate it by providing for the governmental manufacture of those things, a large component part of which is powder.

But the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. AMES] loudly proclaimed at that time that there was no Ammunition Trust. From the days of the shot pouch and the powder horn to the present time the ammunition industry, like others, has undergone radical changes. Only a few years back the firms which now control the fixed ammunition situation in the United States were engaged in supplying the component parts thereof, or some of them, to the various houses throughout the country, which either resold them in that condition or made up the hand-loaded ammunition and sold that.

Thereafter the Winchester Repeating Arms Co. and the Union Metallic Cartridge Co. and the United States Cartridge Co. entered into a combination that controls the fixed ammunition situation in the United States. The immediate result of this was that the members of the combination told their former customers for component parts of ammunition that they must cease making ammunition and buy the completed cartridges from members of the association. Not only that, but, in harmony with the arbitrary methods of practically every other powerful and illegal combination, they informed their prior customers for parts, who had purchased machinery and owned it, as well as other equipment, and had owned supplies in large quantities, that they not only could not sell more of the hand-made ammunition, but that the members of the association would not take back from them the unmade parts which they had on hand.

One of the circular propositions issued by one of the members of this association is before me—a circular that is sent out to the trade generally, issued by the Winchester Repeating Arms Co. The method that is employed by this concern, I understand, is also used by the rest of the members of the combination.

A wholesaler desires to buy a carload of ammunition. It is sold to him on 60 days' time, with an agreement that he must not sell it only to the trade at the price at which he buys it; and then after a period of 90 days or 1 year they will make rebates to him—certain commission—if he has been good and has not cut prices.

After the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. AMES] the other day, I received from a number of wholesalers throughout the country copies of these circulars, which show this unlawful combination. The following is a copy of a circular received:

NOVEMBER 20, 1907.

GENTLEMEN: Withdrawing all previous salary and commission arrangements with you applying to our metallic ammunition and loaded shot shells to which our name is attached, we now submit the following proposition, to remain in force, if accepted, until you are otherwise notified by us:

We inclose herewith our current discount sheet on metallic ammunition and loaded shot shells, and under separate cover we mail you a copy of our general illustrated catalogue and current price list No. 73, to which it applies, showing our f. o. b. factory or New York invoice prices.

We will, until you are further advised by us, allow you a commission upon your purchases made from us directly equal in amount to 12½ per cent on our metallic cartridges, primed shells and bullets, ball caps, brass shot shells, paper shot shells (empty), gun wads, and primers, and 10 per cent on loaded shot shells in less than carload lots, and on loaded shot shells in carload lots 10 per cent and 2½ per cent, calculating the same on the basis of our factory or New York invoice prices, such earned commission payable quarterly, making the first payment to you on April 1, 1908, for purchases made during the quarter ending December 31, 1907.

Terms: Less 2 per cent for cash within 10 days from invoice date or 60 days net cash. Please note that the cash discount of 2 per cent will be allowed by us only when remittances are mailed within 10 days from respective invoice dates. On accounts remaining unpaid after maturity (60 days) interest will be charged at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from maturity date to date of payment.

In making you the foregoing proposition it is contemplated and understood that you will make no sales of the line of goods herein mentioned on a lower basis than our f. o. b. factory billing prices, freight added (less than carload rate), from factory, or New York, to destination, such selling prices to be not less than we may determine. Until further notice, however, your selling prices are to remain as at present.

That you issue no printed wholesale prices (except such quotation sheet bear the name and address of your customer, over your signature, and be sent under seal) at less than 5 per cent advance over the extreme selling prices above referred to, and these prices to ammunition dealers only.

That all sales at retail to individuals or consumers are to be at not less than 10 per cent advance over the wholesale prices designated for your city, except that loaded shells may be sold at wholesale prices to regularly organized gun clubs purchasing in quantity.

Any disregard of these conditions will forfeit your claim to any commission as herein mentioned that might otherwise be earned, and unfilled orders will become null and void.

Considering that you are now, and have been, identified with the handling of ammunition of the Union Metallic Cartridge Co. and United States Cartridge Co. manufacture, in addition to that of our own manufacture, and desiring to avoid all conditions that might prove embarrassing to you, we will not object to your continuing to handle these brands without prejudice to this commission arrangement with you, provided your sales of such brands are on no more favorable basis or terms than those of like goods of our manufacture as hereinbefore stated.

This offer or tender, if accepted by you, is not a contract, except as to the payment of commissions earned by you; and we reserve the absolute and unconditional right, at our option, to withdraw this tender and prices, or to substitute others, or to discontinue the payment of commission hereunder, or to terminate this and any other arrangements at our pleasure; but in the event of such withdrawal or termination, remittance for amount of earned commissions to date of such withdrawal or termination will be made when due, except as hereinbefore provided, and also except that should you fail to pay any of our accounts in full no payment of commissions for the preceding or current quarter will be made until such indebtedness has been paid in full, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum for the extra time taken.

All correspondence pertaining to the subject of this letter or with reference to the purchase or sale of our goods should be addressed to this office.

If the above meets with your approval, please sign the inclosed acknowledgment forms and return the original to this office, retaining the duplicate for your own files.

Yours, respectfully,

WINCHESTER REPEATING ARMS CO.
G. E. HODSON, First Vice President.

Attached to a similar circular, sent out by the same concern, which was sent me, is a leaflet which reads as follows:

A rebate of 12 per cent on loaded shells and of 17½ per cent on metallic ammunition is given at the beginning of each year, beyond these printed discounts, to all customers (to whom these lists are sent) on the previous year's purchases, providing they have been good and have not cut the price.

That is to say, if a man buys a carload of ammunition he must sell only at the price he paid for it, and if he is "good" during the year and sells it at the price fixed—if he maintains the association agreement they call it being "good"—he will then have rebated to him from 12 to 17 per cent. There is one concern in the United States now selling ammunition in Duluth, Minneapolis, St. Paul, Des Moines, and at points on the Pacific coast that has a claim for rebate for more than $15,000, and it is claimed by a member of this combination that this particular concern has not been "good," and hence is not entitled to the commission.

A gentleman from Cincinnati also forwarded to me copies of petitions that have been filed in the United States Circuit Court of the Southern District of Ohio, western division, wherein the Winchester Repeating Arms Co. has commenced three suits against Evans Bros. to enjoin them from selling ammunition and guns purchased by them from the Winchester Repeating Arms Co. at a price less than that fixed by the manufacturer. I quote the following from one of these petitions:

Your orator shows that from the origin of and during its business and manufacture it has been the uniform custom and practice of your orator * * * to fix, indicate, and announce, by and through catalogues, price lists, price sheets, and discount lists, fair, reasonable, and uniform prices therefore from your orator to wholesale dealers, from wholesale dealers to retail dealers, and from retail dealers to purchasers for use, and to request that all dealers in your orator's patented products observe and maintain such uniform, indicated prices in selling the patented product. * * * That the conduct, methods, and policy of said dealers in refusing to observe and maintain the prices designated for your orator's patented products, and in advertising and selling such products at less than such indicated price, has produced and was producing great demoralization and confusion in the trade.

In these three cases it is alleged that the product of this concern is sold only under a license, which, among other things, contains the following provisions:

(1) Jobbers may sell at wholesale only to retail dealers regularly handling their goods; may not sell to anyone designated by the company as a violator of license conditions; and may sell only at prices established by the company.

(2) Retail dealers * * * may not sell at less than the current retail price established by the company.

Here, then, we have laid down the astounding proposition that inasmuch as 99 per cent of the guns and 76 per cent of the output of the concern is covered by letters patent, that these Government patents give them a license to hold up the trade and to say to a wholesaler in that ammunition what he shall sell the ammunition for and to a retailer what he shall sell it for, and that the patents of the United States protect them in that kind of a transaction.

Mr. HINDS. Has not the Supreme Court of the United States declared such contracts illegal in a similar case?

Mr. GOOD. Yes; I think the Supreme Court has declared them illegal in every instance where that court has passed upon them; but this is an action that is pending in the lower court.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman—and I speak only for myself—that Congress should define its policy in the matter of the procurement not only of ammunition but of armament as well; that Congress should direct the Chief of Ordnance, if we have ideas, what those ideas are; if we have some fixed convictions, what those convictions are. Otherwise, I suppose that the present policy will prevail, that of laying off men at the arsenal and buying this ammunition and buying these guns and gun carriages at an increased price of from 33 to 127½ per cent over Government cost at our arsenals.

Mr. TILSON. Before leaving the matter of the combination spoken of, has the gentleman any positive evidence that the ammunition company he has spoken of—the Winchester Repeating Arms Co.—has entered into a combination with others? Are not these circulars the gentleman speaks of simply from that company itself as a company and not representing any combination?

Mr. GOOD. I will say to the gentleman that I understand that the three concerns I mentioned sent out printed circulars that are in all respects similar; at any rate their methods of selling their output are similar. Formerly these three companies, with other companies, had a clearing house in New York City, and Mr. William Odell, of New York, was the commissioner, and all commissions were paid through Mr. Odell. Every dollar of profit or commission due the jobber on ammunition manufactured and sold by these concerns was paid to Mr. Odell, and he made the distribution for the various manufacturers of ammunition who were parties to this agreement.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 21 minutes.

Mr. GOOD. With regard to the ammunition association, I want to say further that the members of this association do not hesitate to enforce fully these arbitrary conditions upon their customers. They allow no commission or salary, as they call it, for the sale of goods if it is discovered that a dealer did not hold up the high price fixed by the association.

As an illustration of the extreme oppression to which these arms and ammunition men go, in common with others of the bold price fixer's stamp, I have learned of one man in one of the large cities, a wide-awake business man, who had been led to believe that the attachment to goods of a so-called "license label" compelling the maintenance of prices, where any patent was involved, was a license and authority issued directly under and by and with the sanction of the United States Government, and that on breach of its condition it was only necessary for the complainant to make known the fact to the proper authorities of the Government to have the poor, innocent purchasing or selling offender punished, including dispossession as to his own property.

There are in this bill a number of provisions providing for the purchase, manufacture of armament, and the manufacture and purchase of ammunition. It has occurred to me that Congress ought to say whether or not we should continue to give these contracts to concerns that charge from 32 to 127 per cent more for the manufacture of them than it costs the Government of the United States when it manufactures them at the arsenal.

A few days ago, when discussing the question of the manufacture of powder, I think I made some mistake in regard to the cost of the manufacture of powder at the arsenal. The cost of powder is not as great as I then stated. I make this statement, relying upon the report of the Chief of Ordnance for 1911. In that report he says:

During the last fiscal year approximately 385,000 pounds of cannon powder and 67,000 pounds of caliber .30 small-arms powder were manufactured. The cost of caliber .30 small-arms powder is about 10.5 cents per pound more than that of cannon powder. A total of 985,000 pounds of cannon powder and 80,000 pounds of caliber .30 powder have been manufactured since the factory was put into operation. The factory cost of this powder has been about $497,000. Had this powder been purchased by contract at prevailing prices, it would have cost approximately $685,500. The saving from the powder appropriation has, therefore, been about $188,500, which is $23,500 in excess of the cost of the factory. The factory has, therefore, paid for itself in the three years it has been in operation, if the charges, such as interest, etc., not coming out of the appropriation, are left out of consideration.

Again, he says:

As stated in my last annual report, the capacity of the factory will be such as would permit, with the employment of only one shift, the manufacture of more than four-fifths of the powder that is now being annually procured.

Notwithstanding the fact that it is only costing the Government 38 cents a pound for cannon powder, not including overhead charges, we are paying 60 cents a pound for cannon powder. By running only one shift per day we now have capacity for manufacturing four-fifths of the entire powder that is now being procured. Should we not at least operate our powder mill to one-third of its capacity? It does seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that while we are considering these appropriations that Congress should take some action in the matter of defining our policy. If we are to economize, let us economize when it comes to making appropriations and not when Congress adjourns and the campaign is on. [Applause.] That may be a good time to talk economy; this is a good time to practice real economy.

I submit that it is not economy to give the Secretary of War and the Chief of Ordnance unlimited power in the purchase of powder, and I submit that in the building of guns and in the authorization for the purchase of armament and other ordnance and ordnance stores that the Congress should take a positive stand, and that stand should be this: We would keep our arsenals at work to their full capacity on every article that can be manufactured cheaper there than it can be purchased for, and that we should purchase from private manufacture only those articles that we can not manufacture and those articles which we can purchase cheaper than we can manufacture. This program ought to commend itself to the common sense of Members of this House. I now yield what time I have remaining to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

Mr. HINDS. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. GOOD. Certainly.

Mr. HINDS. May I ask this question? I am not at all familiar with the manufacture of powder in the Army arsenals, but two or three years ago I did go to Indianhead and, incidentally, I went over the powder factory there. Now, I saw it reckoned out in the hearings before the Committee on Naval Affairs that when the interest on the investment, depreciation of plant, and other expenses of that sort are counted in that the difference of cost of production between the Indianhead plant, which I think is a very fine plant, and the commercial price that is paid is not great.

Mr. GOOD. About 5 cents a pound. I think the Indianhead cost was about 43 cents, not including overhead charges.

Mr. HINDS. Something of that sort. Does the estimate which the gentleman has read for the Army take into account these incidental expenses?

Mr. GOOD. The price I have read, Gen. Crozier states, does not include overhead charges of any kind or interest or depreciation, but these are included when he says that the cost was about 55 cents a pound. But I will say this, that the overhead charges, of course, are going on whether we manufacture 1,000 pounds or 1,000,000 pounds, and so by increasing our output at the arsenals we will decrease the cost per pound.

Mr. HINDS. But at the arsenal at Indian Head that will not be so, as they have a limited capacity.

Mr. GOOD. I think they only run one-third of their capacity, or one shift per day.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman permit?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield?

Mr. GOOD. Just for a question.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I have recently heard from Admiral Twinning that the powder at Indianhead costs 33.6 cents to produce it; that figuring in the interest on the money and other charges which the Powder Trust figures in the cost it would run probably to 45.6 cents per pound, whereas they are now paying the trust 60 cents per pound.

Mr. GOOD. I now yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. BERGER].

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I want to call the attention of the House to one of the most outrageous invasions of constitutional rights that has ever occurred in this country.

I refer to the brutal manhandling and clubbing of women and children in Lawrence, Mass., by the official and unofficial agents of the Wool Trust.

The wage earners of the worsted mills of Lawrence are striking against extremely low wages and inhuman conditions. While the worsted industry is one of the most highly protected of all our industries, the wages paid, according to the statements given out in that city, amounted to an average of less than $6 per week.

It is true that a good many of the workers—in fact, a majority—are women and children. That is just one of the cruel characteristics of the present system.

The inventive genius of humanity has made it possible to introduce machinery which does not require for its operation skilled labor or great physical strength. The employers are thus put in a position whereby they can replace men by women and children. It is a well-known fact that the combined earnings of the family, as a rule, does not amount to more than what the husband alone earned before woman and child labor was introduced in this industry. Yet the evil of woman and child labor is continuously on the increase, because competition and the capitalistic profit system seem to require it.

The average wage of the 25,000 operatives in Lawrence, Mass., was less than $6 per week. Lately a law was put into operation establishing 54 hours as a week's work instead of 56 hours. The manufacturers immediately cut the wages of the operatives 50 cents per week.

This reduction meant a great deal to the poor wageworkers. It meant a loss of 10 loaves of bread every week. Naturally they resisted it, and went on strike.

The interference of the police and of the militia very soon created trouble.

The strikers, in order to be able to resist longer, sent some of their children away to be taken care of by friends in New York and other cities. About 300 thus left their homes.

The mill owners, who feared that the strikers would thereby be in a position to win the strike, decided to stop any further sending away of children, although there are no legal, constitutional, or moral excuses for such action. But having the militia and police at their disposal, they forcibly took the children away from their mothers and fathers on Saturday, February 24, when the children were at the depot to be sent away. The policemen clubbed the men and women and were particularly brutal toward the women and children. A great number of the parents were arrested and held under the pretext that they were going to abandon their children.

There is not the slightest basis for such a charge. The children sent away left Lawrence only temporarily. They are well taken care of by their friends; in fact, they are enjoying a sort of vacation. It is almost incredible to believe that the right of free movement can be interfered with and "concentrado camps" created in a State belonging to the American Commonwealth in order to win a strike for the mill owners. It seems incredible that children should be practically imprisoned and starved with their parents in order to bring about the capitulation of workmen and working women fighting for better conditions.

Mr. BURLESON. What mills?

Mr. BERGER. Lawrence, Mass.

Mr. BURLESON. What is the character of the mills?

Mr. BERGER. Worsted, woolen mills. It means that the mill owners have put an embargo on the city of Lawrence, with the assistance of the governor and of a petty judge in Massachusetts. By the way, the governor of Massachusetts, Mr. Foss, is a Democrat.

Mr. Chairman, I have introduced a bill in this House asking for an investigation of the strike in Lawrence and of the methods employed by the American Worsted Mills. I hope that the Committee on Rules, to which this resolution was referred, will as speedily as possible bring in a report. I hope this for the sake of humanity, of justice, and of good citizenship.

I request unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the United Press report of the outrage at Lawrence to-day, which was a repetition of the disgraceful scenes last Saturday.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The article is as follows:

WOMEN AGAIN TARGETS FOR POLICE CLUBS—LAWRENCE MILL STRIKERS FORCED TO RETREAT SEVEN BLOCKS UNDER RAIN OF BLOWS—YOUNG GIRLS ARE BEATEN BY FORCE—SHOOTING AFFRAY IN EARLY MORNING PRECEDED RIOTING IN MAIN STREET OF CITY.

LAWRENCE, MASS., February 26, 1912.

Formed into flying wedges, cordons of the metropolitan State police to-day repeatedly charged a parade of 10,000 strikers and their sympathizers, smashing heads, hands, and arms with clubs and tearing clothing.

Men, women, and young girls were beaten by brute force.

The women were beaten about the hips and breasts as much as was possible. As the police charged they could plainly be heard to yell: "Get the men anywhere you can hit 'em. Hit the women on the hips and arms. We don't want to break any women's heads."

WOMEN ARE BEATEN.

A woman would be seen to shoot from the ground and run toward a side street. Instantly two or three policemen would be after her. Usually in such cases a night stick well aimed brought the woman to the ground like a shot, and the police would be on her hauling, beating, and pulling at her in as many different ways as there were policemen making the arrest.

This charge into the crowd and then a retreat to the next corner and then another charge and retreat was carried on for seven blocks along Essex Street. During the entire time the strikers—men, women, and children—continued singing.

After each savage attack by the police they would re-form without apparent leadership, and as if they had forgotten completely that they were the objects of attack, would calmly and without disorder continue their march up Essex Street, singing—always singing—patriotic and national airs.

During all this time the police were being urged by officers of the militia "to go in and break 'em—break 'em up." For some reason not an armed militiaman was seen during the entire affair.

TEN THOUSAND IN PARADE.

The crowd of 10,000 strikers and sympathizers gathered as if by magic early this morning when a squad of special policemen opened fire on an Italian tenement in Common Street.

When the excitement had subsided the army of unemployed began the march to the railroad station, where many had gathered, having been told another attempt would be made to-day to send children away.

They resembled a great crowd turning out for a gala event, except when scores of police dashed recklessly in and out of the crowd, when they were booed and hissed, the jeers being succeeded by a peculiar buzzing hum as if made from millions of bees.

The police version of the shooting affair which preceded the parade is that a squad of 15 special police was passing when a tenement window was thrown up and a hand holding a .44-caliber revolver was stuck out. A shot was fired, and another window was raised and a hand thrust forth holding a revolver. A second shot was fired, and then the special police began shooting at the windows. Fifty or more bullets rattled against windows and doors of the tenements.

SHOT IN BACK.

Carmelo Milas, a striker, was shot in the back as he ran from the scene. Three of five men, all strikers, who were standing in an alley from which Milas could not possibly have been seen, were arrested and charged with murder.

All three had cracked heads when they were thrown into cells at police headquarters. The police say Salvatore Bruno, one of the prisoners, had a smoking gun in his hand when taken. Two of the crowd got away.

POINDEXTER SCORES TREATMENT OF WOMEN IN LAWRENCE STRIKE.

LAWRENCE, MASS., February 26, 1912.

After a personal investigation into the action of the authorities in arresting men who were sending their children to other cities to be cared for, United States Senator MILES POINDEXTER, of Washington, to-day gave out the following statement:

"It is evidently a campaign of starvation of women and children. The mill owners, backed up, strange to say, by the police, the militia, the prosecuting attorney, and the local judges, are making a concentration camp of Lawrence. The only parallels I know of were the Spanish concentration in Cuba and Kitchener's Boer campaign, in which the British Empire extinguished the liberty of a people by starving their women and children. The manner in which the order has been carried out in Lawrence, the rough handling of women and children, throwing them struggling into jail, all without warrant or even the forms of law, forcibly reminds one of Russian and Turkish brutalities to Jews and Armenians. The fact that such a thing occurs in America is startling, and shows how far our institutions have been degraded by avarice.

WOMEN ABUSED.

"The women and children were perfectly peaceable when they were forcibly stopped in their attempt to board a railroad train. In some instances they were cursed and abused by the police, dragged by force to a patrol wagon, the women thrown into jail, and the children incarcerated at the poor farm. The police contention that these people do not have the right to send their children in the care of friends to other cities is simply ridiculous. They have the same right to do so that anyone has.

"The true significance of this proceeding is not simply its effect on these people, but it is an assault upon the rights of every American citizen. A good many eulogies of the Constitution are heard nowadays. This affords an opportunity to test their genuineness. If crowds of peaceable people can be assaulted by officials of the Government, brutally treated, and incarcerated without any charge of violation of law being made or sustained against them, instead of being a constitutional Government of liberty under the law it becomes one of money and force, and people everywhere will soon be adjusting themselves to this new condition.

OF GREAT SIGNIFICANCE.

"It is of the most vital significance. If in exercising the right to the peaceful pursuit of their domestic affairs these people can be arrested without warrant and without any pretense that they have violated the law, then any of us are liable to be treated in the same way whenever it suits the interests of those having the physical power to do so. If we can be confined in this way within the city we can also be deported forcibly from the city when it is desirable for these astonishing authorities to do so.

"If these people can be forcibly kept in Lawrence, at the pleasure of the mill owners, to work at starvation wages or starve, then they are in reality slaves, and it is not desirable for any of us that slavery should be reestablished in this country."

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. RAUCH].

Mr. RAUCH. Mr. Chairman, in view of the very comprehensive statement made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] I shall be very brief in my statement in respect to this bill.

Being one of the Members who has been engaged in the preparation of this bill, I wish to make a statement indorsing it. It is true that large reductions have been made and that the bill as reported to the House comes about $3,000,000 under the estimates for the fiscal year 1913. The most of this reduction is made in the items in the bill appropriating money for the continental part of our country. There has been little reduction in the items which carry appropriations for our insular possessions and the work in the Hawaiian and Philippine Islands will not be handicapped in any way. Those who are charged with the responsibility of preparing plans for the work for which the expenditures in this bill are made regard the work of fortification in our insular possessions as being at this time of the most importance and the committee has been guided by their judgment in the matter.

In regard to the introduction of new legislation into this bill, the committee has believed it to be wise to refrain from so doing. Amendments like the one which has been often proposed removing the limitations which require that our Government can purchase material abroad only in limited quantities, in the opinion of the committee, are in a measure political in their character and, if I mistake not, it is the policy of the committee to keep its work as free from politics as possible and for that reason it has refused to encumber the different items with amendments which change existing law, believing it to be better for the House to make such changes when it deems them to be necessary.

We are impressed, Mr. Chairman, with the fact that the appropriations which we are compelled to make are mounting higher and higher with each succeeding Congress. It is true that we can never say here we will stop and go no further. After the fortifications in the Hawaiian and Philippine Islands and the Panama Canal are completed the progress in the scientific construction of guns used in the fortification work, fire-control, and range-finding devices will make it necessary for us to expend money each year to keep abreast of the times. While this is true we have reasonable assurance that the time is not far distant when the work which is now being carried on in the Philippine and Hawaiian Islands will be completed. What change in plans, what future developments, future problems, or the development of present ones will disclose, this committee can not determine. I can only say that the committee, having in mind the protection of our country on the one hand and the burdens of taxation of our people on the other, have drafted this bill in such a way as to give due consideration to both.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

ARMAMENT OF FORTIFICATIONS.

For the purchase, manufacture, and test of mountain, field, and siege cannon, including their carriages, sights, implements, equipments, and the machinery necessary for their manufacture at the arsenals, $300,000: Provided, That the Chief of Ordnance, United States Army, is hereby authorized to enter into contracts or otherwise incur obligations for the purposes above mentioned not to exceed $300,000, in addition to the appropriations herein and heretofore made.

Mr. RAUCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "dollars," in line 1, page 5, insert the following: "Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the purchase of any mounted, field, or siege cannon, including their carriages, from any person, firm, or corporation which has not at the time of commencement of said work established an eight-hour workday for all employees, laborers, and mechanics engaged or to be engaged in the work of construction of the cannon named herein."

Mr. RAUCH. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is this: The House has already gone on record on this proposition, and I think the Members are familiar with that record.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, which has just been reported.

[Mr. TRIBBLE addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. RAUCH] raises no new question here, and for that reason I have not felt that it was necessary that any elaborate statement should be made on my own part as to any views that I may entertain touching the provision. Personally I have always been a believer in shortening the hours of labor. I believe that man's civilization has increased and progressed with the shortening of the hours of labor. I firmly believe in such lessening of his toil that he may have time for something beyond simply his bodily needs. [Applause.]

I believe this and believe it intensely. At the same time I have not always been convinced that situations warranted the Government in undertaking arbitrarily to establish conditions that did not exist in the commercial world. Speaking solely for myself, I have sometimes thought that a provision of this kind ought to be accompanied with a proviso for overtime work with overtime pay; in other words, to hold out an inducement for the shortening of the workday without compelling the absolute shortening of it at a time when economic and industrial conditions in particular trades might not warrant that reduction of hours.

But this House has recently passed an eight-hour law, which is not only as broad as this provision, but broader, in that it embraces all work that may be done for the Government, not simply by the Government itself, but for the Government under contract. That being so, it did not seem to me, as the Member in charge of the bill, necessary that I should make to the House any detailed statement touching the matter. The question is no longer new or open. The House has expressed its view on it, and I am perfectly willing to accept the judgment of the committee on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

[Mr. BUCHANAN addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana. This House has passed, during the present session and by a practically unanimous vote, a comprehensive eight-hour bill. The purpose is to put under the operation of the eight-hour law all work done for the United States Government. This amendment is in line with the recommendation of the President of the United States in a message sent to Congress, either at the last session or the preceding one, and since it seems to be the adopted policy of the House and of the Executive, and is in line with the policy heretofore adopted, I believe it wise to adopt this amendment at this time.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. TRIBBLE. The gentleman from Illinois stated that the eight-hour-a-day law was enacted in 1868; will the gentleman from New York tell me if that is correct?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman was correct, but by the construction of the Attorney General it made that law inoperative to vessels built for the Navy on the ground that battle-ships or war vessels were not public works within the meaning of the law. Two years ago Congress made another attempt to place the building of war vessels under the operation of the eight-hour law. An extraordinary opinion by the Attorney General practically nullified the action of Congress. In the last session of the Sixty-first Congress a provision was inserted in the naval appropriation act about which there could be no question whatever.

I believe it is in language identical with the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana. For the first time bids were received for the construction of vessels authorized for the Navy with the distinct understanding that they should be constructed as Congress intended under the provisions of the eight-hour law. I do not wish to enter at this time into a discussion—

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD (continuing). Into a discussion of matters properly affecting the naval bill. I desire to say this, however, to the gentleman from Georgia, that I am somewhat familiar with the history of legislation in regard to the construction of war vessels in Government yards and by contract. I originated in 1900 the movement to construct some vessels authorized for the Navy in Government yards. I do not know what has taken place in the Naval Committee during this session of Congress, but I would not be surprised if it were a repetition of what has transpired on former occasions. In the last session of the Sixty-first Congress, for instance, information was laid before the Naval Committee which demonstrated that it would cost an excessive sum to construct a vessel then under construction in a Government yard. After the bill was reported to the House I demonstrated to the satisfaction of the House that there had been charged up between $600,000 and $700,000 of overhead charges and items properly pertaining to the naval station to the cost of that ship then under construction.

The information I was able to lay before the House at that time made the situation so clear that the information submitted by the department had little weight with the House in its action. After the department has completed making out its case before the Naval Committee this year there will be ample opportunity to analyze the information which it volunteers and to submit some additional information, which, perhaps, will be as surprising as that submitted by myself during the last session when the naval bill was under consideration.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I would like to ask the gentleman this question—if it is a fact, as I stated, that the gentleman from Georgia, who has raised his voice in protest for the first time since the eight-hour law was passed in 1868—that the first voice that has been raised in protest in this Chamber is that raised by the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I believe that statement is a little broad. In the first place, I have not been here all of that time and I can not say whether anyone else has ever opposed eight-hour legislation. I do believe, however, that there are men both in this House and outside of it who have honest convictions as to the inadvisability of the eight-hour law. For myself, I believe that it would be a great benefit to all the country if such improvements could be devised as would enable those engaged in agricultural pursuits not to spend 12 and 14 hours a day, but a less number of hours, in the cultivation of the soil. I know the people would be benefited and the country would be benefited if those engaged in agricultural pursuits could devote some of the time now given to arduous toil to recreation and to mental occupations. They would be broadened, better informed, more widely cultivated, and better and happier people.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky moves that all debate on this amendment close in 10 minutes.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I am surprised—

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Kentucky yield for just one question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman intend to move that the committee rise after this matter is disposed of?

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, it was not the particular desire of the gentleman that the committee rise, but I named 10 minutes thinking the gentleman from Illinois might desire 5 of it.

Mr. MANN. I do not desire any time, but by that time it will be half past 5 o'clock.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not know how much discussion will come up in regard to the remaining paragraphs of the bill, but I would rather like to complete the bill this evening.

Mr. MANN. Well, it did not look that way on this paragraph.

[Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired on this amendment. The question before the committee is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. RAUCH].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON].

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 5, at the end of line 5, add: "Provided, That no contract for the purchase of any such armament shall be let in any case where the Government can manufacture the same at a less cost, except only for such armament as it may be necessary to procure in addition to the capacity of the Government to manufacture at its arsenals."

Mr. SHERLEY. To that, Mr. Chairman, I will make a point of order, or reserve it, if the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON] desires to make a statement on his amendment.

Mr. MANN. I suggest that the gentleman move to rise instead. It is now nearly half past 5 o'clock.

Mr. SHERLEY. When this is ended I will do that.

Mr. MANN. Well, it is too late to go on further now.

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to make unreasonable demands on Members of the House. The amendment is offered with the reservation of the point of order, and I now move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOUSTON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 20111, the fortifications appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 26, 1912.

LAWRENCE (MASS.) LABOR STRIKE.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I rise, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of asking unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman that he let it go over until to-morrow morning. It is now too late for such a matter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution which I have sent to the Clerk's desk be inserted in the Record.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] asks unanimous consent that the resolution which he has sent to the Clerk's desk be inserted in the Record. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

House resolution 433.

Whereas there is a strike in progress in Lawrence, Mass.; and whereas it is alleged that the police power of the city of Lawrence and the militia of the State of Massachusetts are being used to forcibly prevent parents from sending their children into other States, where arrangements have been made to take care of them until the strike is over; and

Whereas it is further alleged that many of these children do not belong to parents who are on strike, and many others have been secured either by intimidating the parents or by the grossest misrepresentation, made possible because many of the strikers are foreigners and do not understand our language; and

Whereas if the first allegation is true it is a violation of the fourth and fourteenth amendments to the Constitution and the inherent right of citizens to travel from State to State: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Labor, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to investigate thoroughly the allegations set forth in the preamble of this resolution and the causes which have produced such a condition of affairs.

Said committee, or any subcommittee thereof, is hereby authorized to sit during the sessions of Congress either at Washington or at Lawrence, Mass., to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to employ such stenographic and clerical assistance as may be necessary for the purpose of carrying out the provisions and purposes of this resolution, and that the expenses thereof, in a sum not to exceed in the aggregate $10,000, be paid from the contingent fund of the House on vouchers ordered by said committee, signed by the chairman thereof, and approved by the Committee on Accounts. Said committee shall make a full report to this House as to whether, by reason of any facts thus ascertained, there shall be legislation by Congress with reference thereto.

C., and Columbia, Ga.," approved August 5, 1909, with House amendments thereto, disagreed to by the Senate, on which the Senate requested a conference.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House insist on its amendments and grant the conference requested.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] moves that the House insist upon its amendments to the bill and agree to the conference requested. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 27, 1912.

The Senate met at 2 o'clock p. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

SENATOR FROM DELAWARE.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

Certain resolutions were offered yesterday in the Senate by the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] formulating charges against me. I will at this time confine myself to making the most emphatic denial of the truth of the charges made and invite any action which the Senate may deem proper to take in the premises.

NATIONAL SOCIETY, DAUGHTERS OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the annual report of the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution for the year ended October 11, 1911, which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 17238) to provide for an investigation of the collection and disposal of garbage, ashes, refuse, dead animals, and night soil in the District of Columbia and employment of a competent sanitary engineer to report the latest approved methods for disposal of the same, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House insists upon its amendments to the bill of the Senate (S. 4551) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the building of a dam across the Savannah River at or near the mouth of Stevens Creek, between the counties of Edgefield, S. C., and Columbia, Ga.," approved August 5, 1909. It agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. ADAMSON, Mr. RICHARDSON, and Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 4475) to amend an act entitled "An act to simplify the issue of enrollment and licenses of vessels of the United States," and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

SENATOR FROM WISCONSIN.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, my attention has been called to an error in the printing of the calendar which affects the order of business. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of yesterday contains the notice which I gave relative to the investigation of charges against Senator STEPHENSON. I observe that on the calendar of to-day the notice is misstated. The notice given yesterday was "that after to-day"—which of course was after yesterday—"after to-day, on each day after the expiration of the morning hour, I shall ask consideration for a matter," and so forth, reciting it.

On the first page of to-day's calendar it says that I gave notice "that after to-morrow," which would postpone it for a day, "following the routine morning business," and the words "each day" have been omitted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The correction will be made, as requested by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. I wish to have the correction made, because I desire to proceed under the notice of yesterday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The correction will be made.

WATERS OF NIAGARA RIVER.

Mr. BURTON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 232, Order of Business 350.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). The morning business is not yet closed, the Chair will state to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BURTON. I understood that there were no further bills or joint resolutions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There are two resolutions coming over from yesterday, which are on the desk.

Mr. BURTON. This, I take it, can be taken up by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It may.

Mr. BURTON. It is a measure of some urgency, and I should like to have it considered now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent for the consideration of a joint resolution, which the Secretary will read by title.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the title of the joint resolution for the information of the Senate.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 232) extending the operation of the act for the control and regulation of the waters of Niagara River, for the preservation of Niagara Falls, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I only desire to say that I shall not object, with the understanding that immediately after the consideration of this measure I shall call up the Stephenson case, which is a matter of the highest personal privilege. I merely give notice that after this I shall interpose that business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The morning business is not yet closed. Is there objection?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I am making no captious objection to the consideration of this measure. I wish to be informed respecting its merits. I want to make some inquiries about it.

Mr. BURTON. Very well. I trust I shall be able to answer the inquiries.

SENATOR FROM DELAWARE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 230, submitted by Mr. REED on the 26th instant, authorizing and directing the Committee on Privileges and Elections to investigate certain charges against HENRY ALGERNON DU PONT, a Senator from the State of Delaware.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I ask that that resolution be permitted to go over.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. REED. If I can be permitted to finish my request—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I ask that that resolution go over until to-morrow. I desire to say that my reason for doing so is that I have been informed that there is certain information which I ought to be in possession of.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, may I inquire what is—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. REED. I yield for a question.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to inquire as to the matter before the Senate. We can not hear a word here which the Senator is saying, so that we do not know what request may have been made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again report the resolution to the Senate by title.

Mr. HEYBURN. The report of the resolution has been distinctly heard, but whatever may have been said has not been heard.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri has made a request.

Mr. HEYBURN. But we have not heard it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was not stated in the form of a motion. The Senator from Missouri has the floor.

Mr. REED. I stated that I should like to have the resolution go over until to-morrow; that I had been informed that there were certain facts that I ought to be placed in possession of, and would be by that time. What those particular facts are I am not sufficiently advised to state at this time. I make the request that the resolution be permitted to go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator make it as a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. REED. Yes; I ask unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the resolution lie on the table until to-morrow. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

LAWRENCE (MASS.) LABOR STRIKE.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I desire to inquire if the morning business has been concluded?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not been concluded. The Chair was about to lay before the Senate another resolution coming over from yesterday.

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from yesterday.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 231) submitted by Mr. POINDEXTER on the 26th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor be, and he is hereby, requested to obtain and report to the Senate, through the Bureau of Labor, full information concerning the condition of the mill workers in Lawrence, Mass., and especially those now engaged in strike, their wages and conditions of living; also what approximate percentage of these employees are subjects of foreign countries, and of what foreign countries; also what action has been taken by the local authorities at Lawrence to forcibly interfere with the free passage of said aliens or others from the city of Lawrence and State of Massachusetts to other States.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I move the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, on yesterday I suggested a proposed amendment to the resolution, but I desire now to state that I shall not offer any amendment to it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have no desire to further discuss the resolution. I merely wish to say that the head of the Bureau of Labor, under the existing statute, is authorized to inquire into labor conditions in any State; but I object in the strongest way to sending the head of the Bureau of Labor, or any other Federal officer, to inquire and report upon the action of the authorities of a State, as is required by this resolution, and I am perfectly ready to dispose of it at once.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask for a reading of the resolution again?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will again read the resolution.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. BORAH. I presume the portion of the resolution to which the Senator from Massachusetts objects is the last sentence?

Mr. LODGE. Inquiring as to the action of the authorities; yes. I do not think there was the slightest need of the resolution, because the head of the Bureau of Labor now has authority under the statute to inquire into labor conditions anywhere.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I desire to say in regard to the objection of the Senator from Massachusetts that the state of the law to which he refers is a very strong reason for the adoption of the resolution. If the head of the Bureau of Labor did not have authority under the law to make this inquiry, I think it would probably be improper for the Senate to ask him to make it. The fact that he has that authority makes it very appropriate for the Senate to request the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, through the Commissioner of Labor, to obtain the information, or, if he already has obtained it, to report it to the Senate.

The particular part of the resolution to which the Senator from Massachusetts objects—that the Commissioner of Labor shall inquire into what action has been taken by the local authorities to forcibly prevent the free passage of these people from the State of Massachusetts to another State—is also within the authority of the Bureau of Labor under the statute. If the authority that is properly exercised by investigation into labor conditions of mill workers by the Department of Commerce and Labor should exclude any investigation of the condition of these people by reason of local ordinances or statutes or the action of the local authorities, it would be a very incomplete, one sided, and practically useless investigation. The law authorizes, and makes it the duty of, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to report the condition of these people. It is impossible to report the true condition of the people unless the effect of the law upon them, the condition in which they are placed by the statute and by the action of the authorities, is included in that investigation. I have information which convinces me that it is very important that conditions in this particular city ought to be investigated by the Bureau of Labor.

As one instance in the town of Lawrence, where this strike is now going on, there live in a tenement house 14 families of millworkers, numbering 54 people, who are involved in the strike. Out of this number there are 22 wage earners. They pay $117 a month rent. They receive $146 and some cents a week in wages. The average wage of the 22 employees in this particular instance is $6.67 a week. That speaks for itself. That is a condition existing under supposedly favorable surroundings, favorable laws, and favorable treatment by the local authorities. I think the Senate is entitled to know what treatment the local authorities accord these people and what the conditions of the law are which lead to results of that kind. It is not in any way elevating to our citizenship to allow conditions of that character to exist. We are soon to consider here a tariff bill with which these questions are very intimately concerned and connected.

As to the importance of the last lines of this resolution, Mr. President, it is not so much—although in that view it is important, too—as to what effect it had upon these women and children for the police and militia to seize them and roughly handle and imprison them, as to the effect upon the respect which the people of this country are going to have for the constituted authorities supposedly acting under the law. It is something of which the Senate ought to take cognizance, something of which it has a right to be informed.

The argument against the authority of Congress to inquire into these matters was made at the time the Bureau of Labor was established, at the time the general law, I believe of 1888, was passed, making it the duty of the bureau to make these investigations. That matter was settled at that time. It was included within the authority given to the bureau at that time, and see no sound objection which can be made now to the Senate calling for the exercise of that power. I move the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I move to strike out in the resolution all after the word "countries," in line 8.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the resolution it is proposed to strike out:

Also what action has been taken by the local authorities at Lawrence to forcibly interfere with the free passage of said aliens or others from the city of Lawrence and State of Massachusetts to other States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, if the portion of the resolution which the Senator from Texas moves to strike out is eliminated, the result will be that in sending an officer of the Government to investigate the conditions existing in this strike we would at the same time be instructing him, in effect, by this action not to investigate the most important feature of the strike. The action, unprecedented, at least so far as I am informed, upon the part of the public authorities in attempting to regulate the domestic affairs of families engaged in this strike is a thing which intimately concerns them, intimately concerns the condition of all the workers there, and intimately affects the result of this conflict between capital and labor and the conditions under which it is being conducted. I simply wanted to make this statement in order that the effect of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas might be understood.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I move to amend the amendment by striking out all after the word "Resolved."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all of the resolution after the word "Resolved," in line 1.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the motion of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] if passed of course kills the resolution. That is the purpose of the amendment to the amendment. I do not believe the resolution ought to be disposed of in this summary way. I am sorry that I can not agree with anything that is suggested by the distinguished Senators who have moved these two separate amendments. I know nothing in regard to the labor conditions existing at Lawrence, Mass., except what I have gained from the press, but it strikes me that, if confidence is to be reposed at all in the press—and I still think it can be—a condition of affairs exists with which the Senate and Congress as a whole is deeply concerned.

As has been said, one of the questions which will come before us within a few days is the question of a tariff, levied, we are told, largely for the protection of American labor. These men work in a protected industry. I do not intend for a moment to undertake in my feeble way to drag this question into politics, but the condition of the laborers in these mills is something that we ought to know; and if it be true that they are subjected to the hardships depicted by the press of the country, if it be true that their wages are starvation wages, then that fact is a potential fact to be considered in the enactment of tariff legislation. One of the highest duties devolving upon this body is to try wisely to shape legislation so that these desperately bad conditions, if they are as bad as depicted, may be alleviated. Therefore I do not think the resolution should be disposed of in this summary way.

Some of these people are American citizens, and those who are not citizens are inhabitants of this country. We are charged with responsibility in regard to them, and we can well afford to direct an officer of the Government to make a proper investigation. So much for the general question.

Now, with reference to the objection to investigating the action of the State authorities, I concede that there we come to a matter which ought to be considered carefully. But it is not proposed here to undertake to regulate the conduct of State officers. It is not contemplated that the Government shall in any manner interfere with the State officers. It is only meant that in connection with the other matters of investigation the facts relative to the action of the State authorities should also be inquired into so far as is pertinent to the main object of the investigation.

But, Mr. President, I go a step further. If it be true, as has been charged, truthfully or not, I do not undertake to say, that the militia have deprived citizens of the natural right to send their children out of one State and into another State, then it is a matter that concerns this body, because as the militia are now organized they are equipped by the Federal Government, and they are to a certain extent maintained by the Federal Government, and they are, in fact, a branch of the Army of the United States. Therefore it is a very important question whether the militia have been used for oppressive purpose. I trust an investigation will show that that has not been the case. I trust that investigation will show that no officer has in any manner trespassed upon the rights and liberties of these people. But, in view of all that has been said, it seems to me the least we can do is to ascertain the absolute facts.

Mr. POINDEXTER obtained the floor.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President—

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, as has been stated by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], I presume there is no objection on the part of anyone to a proper investigation by the officer of the law charged with this duty into these conditions affecting labor in Massachusetts. The resolution itself, however, I submit, is not in a form to receive the support of this body. The latter part of the resolution I should certainly object to as being a trespass upon the field properly belonging to the State authorities. I will not stop to discuss that further than to allude to one remark which fell from the lips of the honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], in which he speaks of the use of the militia as being something which called for the controlling investigation, if you please, of the United States Government.

The Senator speaks of the militia of the State as being within the control of the Federal Government and as being subject to the supervision of the Federal Government when not called into the service of the Federal Government. That is absolutely and utterly at war with any possible construction of the constitutional relation of the militia to the Federal Government. The militia, when not called into service through the act of the President of the United States, acting in pursuance of express constitutional and congressional authority, belongs exclusively to the State, and what the governor does in the ordering of the militia in the administration of the State government is none of the business of the United States.

Mr. REED. I would not have the Senator misunderstand me. I did not state the proposition definitely, but I did say that we arm the militia—

Mr. BACON. Of course.

Mr. REED. And we equip the militia—

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. REED. And we do have some interest in knowing how the guns and bayonets furnished by the United States Government are being used.

Mr. BACON. If that proposition is correct, then, as the militia are thus armed and thus equipped, every act of the militia in the administration of the State governments would be subject to the supervision of the Federal Government. If one such act by the militia is, another is. The proposition is too plain to be argued. The furnishing of the militia with equipment and with arms is in pursuance of the contemplation and purpose of the Constitution. But, however armed and however equipped, except when called into the service of the United States Government, they are exclusively the agency of the State, and so long as their acts are not in contravention of the limitations prescribed by the Constitution upon the action of the States the Federal Government has no concern in what may be done by the State government with the militia.

It is a most important question, a very vital one, one which reaches far beyond anything contemplated in this resolution, that there should be such a contemplation and such a recognition by the Senate of the United States—that because the militia have arms and equipment at the hands of the Federal Government, therefore the Federal Government has the right to supervise and direct and control and criticize and prohibit, if you please, whatever action it may be deemed proper by the State authorities to require at the hands of the militia.

But, Mr. President, that in passing. What is this resolution? Is it a joint resolution or a concurrent resolution? If it is a joint resolution, Mr. President, it is not in the form of law. If it is a joint resolution, it is not in the form that we can possibly give our sanction to. Laws do not request. Laws direct. The Senate may, if it sees proper, though it does not ordinarily do so, request information of a department; it generally directs that; but where can you find in a statute or a joint resolution, which has the effect of a statute, the use of the word "request"? Law commands. Law does not request.

Now, Mr. President, this resolution has no title by which we may judge whether it is intended to be a resolution which shall be acted upon simply by this body as a Senate resolution or whether it is intended as a concurrent resolution or as a joint resolution.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. LODGE. It is a Senate resolution, and is so defined at the top.

Mr. BACON. What is that?

Mr. LODGE. It is defined at the top as a Senate resolution.

Mr. BACON. It has not a title, but a number is put upon it as a Senate resolution.

Mr. LODGE. A Senate resolution.

Mr. BACON. But there is nothing that I have been able to find in the body of the resolution or in the title of the resolution which indicates it is a Senate resolution.

Mr. LODGE. No; but it is indicated in the first line—"Senate resolution 231."

Mr. BACON. If it had been introduced as a joint resolution, it would have had the same thing on it. If it were a Senate bill, it would have "Senate bill" on it, although it is to go to the House. I can not conceive, however, that the Senator from Washington intended it as a Senate resolution, because the Senate could not possibly give any direction of that kind to an officer of the Government. The Senate can request of a department, or direct of a department, which it usually does, any information or the production of any paper which may be in the possession of the department; but if, outside of such things, a duty is laid upon an officer of the Government to perform a certain duty, it requires a law to do it; and in order that it may be a law, it must be in the form of a statute or a joint resolution. I do not see any possible escape from that proposition.

Now, Mr. President, I repeat that my purpose in moving to strike out all after the word "Resolved" was not to prevent any investigations that it might be proper to make. I was influenced by the fact that, as read on yesterday by the Senator from West Virginia, the law now clothes the very officer mentioned in this resolution with all the authority this resolution would give, except that in the latter part of it, and that latter part contains authority which ought not to be given to any officer, either by joint resolution or by statute, or attempted to be conferred upon him by Senate resolution, which, of course, would not be effective for that purpose. Under the law as it now stands the Department of Commerce—

Mr. POINDEXTER. Will the Senator from Georgia yield for a question?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Will the Senator from Georgia explain how the Commissioner of Labor in investigating the condition of the employees of the mills is going to separate that portion of their condition which is caused by the local authorities from that which is caused by other influences, when the law the Senator refers to authorizes him and instructs him to report their condition?

Mr. BACON. I think, with all due respect to the Senator from Washington, that the latter part of the resolution goes a little further than to direct an inquiry into conditions. It goes into the field of an inquiry of the action which has been taken by the State government. That is the thing that I object to, because if you enter upon such a field where are the activities of the Federal Government in that regard to end? What is to be the limit? Where is the line to be drawn?

I recollect that upon more than one occasion a very distinguished Senator of the State of Massachusetts, who was once our colleague and whose departure we all deplored, Senator Hoar, had occasion to speak to the Senate of the danger of the Senate, through inadvertence or through thoughtlessness or carelessness entering upon a line of conduct or investigation which might lead to such widespread and deplorable consequences as the recognition of the right of the Federal Government to go into the States for the purpose of investigating acts of those States within their own proper jurisdiction and authority.

Mr. President, we all applaud the purpose of the Senator from Washington and we all sympathize with what the Senator from Missouri has said as to the importance that there should be proper information upon these subjects, but everything within its proper sphere and in order. We have recognized that in the enactment of a general law. We have clothed an officer of the General Government with and devolved upon him the duty of making investigations of this kind.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. KERN. Does the Senator from Georgia hold that the Senate of the United States has not the power or the right to request officers of an executive department to furnish information to it?

Mr. BACON. Has the Senator from Indiana completed his question? I ask because the Senator retains the floor. I can not satisfactorily answer him "yes" or "no," and I want him to complete his question, and then I will answer him.

Mr. KERN. The question is whether the Senator claims that the Senate has not the right or the power to call for or to request from an executive officer of the Government, information that he may have or that he may obtain.

Mr. BACON. I will say in reply to the Senator that I have in the past in the Senate made myself possibly sometimes a little obnoxious in my insistence upon the right of the Senate not only to request but to direct any officer of the executive department to furnish to the Senate any information and every paper which might be in his possession. If there has been one thing in which I have been insistent and upon which I have spoken in no uncertain terms it has been that.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President—

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will let me finish my reply to his question before he adds to it. Nobody who knows of the attitude I have occupied on that subject can have any possible doubt of my view on that question.

But the power to request, and not only the power to request but the power to direct, a department to give information, as the Senate usually and almost universally does, except in the case of information desired through the State Department which is of a delicate nature, requiring frequently that there should be coupled with it the right to exercise discretion on the part of the State Department—the power to direct, I say, is one which is exercised by the Senate and one for which I have most earnestly insisted.

But that is a different thing from that which the resolution asks for. It is not for information in the possession of the department; it is not for the production of any paper in the possession of the department, but it is a request that this officer shall proceed to do a certain thing for the purpose of getting information.

Mr. KERN. Under the resolution he is requested to proceed to the performance of his duty under the statute.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will permit me, I will read what it says.

Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor be, and he is hereby, requested to obtain and report to the Senate, through the Bureau of Labor, full information concerning the condition of the mill workers in Lawrence, Mass., and especially those now engaged in strike, their wages and conditions of living; also what approximate percentage of these employees are subjects of foreign countries, and of what foreign countries; also what action has been taken by the local authorities at Lawrence to forcibly interfere with the free passage of said aliens or others from the city of Lawrence and State of Massachusetts to other States.

Now, I do not find in there the language the Senator used.

Mr. KERN. I will ask the Senator whether or not the resolution down to line 8, the word "countries," is not simply a request, a polite request, of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, to perform those duties relative to this particular incident that are prescribed for him in the statute read yesterday by the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. BACON. That may be true; but it practically requests him to do what the law now says he shall do. If that is the case, I do not think it is a proper thing for us to do. We can direct him, if we want to, in a certain way to do certain things. If, however, we wish to prescribe for him certain duties, it has to be done by law and not by request.

Mr. KERN. May not the Senate request the Secretary to perform, in this particular instance, his duties prescribed by law?

Mr. BACON. As a matter of correct procedure, I think not.

Mr. KERN. Is there any legal objection to it?

Mr. BACON. I think there are objections to the propriety of it.

Mr. KERN. Oh! If the Senate has the legal power to direct—

Mr. BACON. Legal power which is not practical in its effect does not amount to anything.

Mr. KERN. If the Senate has power to direct, it certainly has power to prefer a polite request.

Mr. BACON. The same might be said about the enactment of any statute. Congress has the right to enact a statute which shall command, and, according to the Senator, it would be within the proprieties of legislative action, instead of passing a law requiring a certain thing to be done, to pass a law requesting that a certain thing should be done. That matter is more or less technical, and I suggest it for the purpose of having the Senator from Washington, if he desires to do so, put this resolution in shape where we can know exactly what we are doing. If it is a Senate resolution, then it ought to be so denominated; and then when it has passed, if it should be passed, the Secretary of the Senate will not be in doubt as to whether or not he should take it to the other House for concurrence.

If it is intended to be a concurrent or a joint resolution, then it ought to be so stated in order that the Secretary will know what he is to do, and being so stated in order that we may know when we come to vote upon it whether it is a Senate resolution or a joint resolution.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. STONE. May I ask my friend from Georgia a question? Would he have any doubt in his mind as to the right of the Senate to raise a committee of its own to make this investigation?

Mr. BACON. Well, it depends on whether you propose to investigate the action of the State. We would have the power, of course, but I do not think it would be proper for us to do it, so far as the last part of it is concerned, which relates to the action of the State government in the control of its domestic affairs.

Mr. STONE. If my friend will pardon me just a moment, I should like to say, Mr. President, that there is one phase of this resolution that I particularly feel concerned in, for it proposes to gather information that undoubtedly would be of great value to the Senate when we come to consider the tariff bill.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me for the interruption, I have no objection to an investigation which shall be made for that purpose, but that is not the purpose alleged in this resolution. That is not the purpose for which this resolution is proposed.

Mr. STONE. What I mean to say to the Senator and the Senate is that we have heard some statements made here in the Senate since this resolution was taken up as to the people employed there, hundreds and hundreds of them displacing American working men and women, as to the wages they are receiving, as to their manner of living, and all that. Those people are employed in a highly protected industry. We are considering this matter now, I may say to the Senator, on hearings before the Committee on Finance, and a great deal is being said by those who come there to plead for the continuance of the present tariff duties to the effect that they ask for the maintenance of those duties not for themselves or for profit, but for the benevolent purpose of taking care of the working men and women of the country. I did not mean to take the Senator off his feet.

Mr. BACON. Oh, no.

Mr. STONE. So I apologize.

Mr. BACON. No; go on.

Mr. STONE. From this standpoint I would be very glad if some means could be employed to investigate this particular case, for it furnishes an object lesson.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I entirely agree with the Senator from Missouri in that particular; and if he will introduce a resolution looking to an investigation for that purpose, I think it would be an entirely legitimate purpose, the object being to get information as to the condition and wages of these people which will aid the Senate in tariff investigation and consideration and in tariff legislation. But I believe that these things should be done in the proper way and with the proper machinery. If the Senate chose to send a committee of this body there for that purpose it would certainly have the right to do so, and I would vote for an investigation by a Senate committee; but that is not, as I understood it, the purpose of the resolution. I understood that it was the purpose of the resolution to request the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to do exactly that which the law now says he shall do. Mr. President, if we request him to do what the law says he shall do, have we any reason to believe that we will more readily accomplish the end than if we leave the law in the shape of a command, rather than compromise it by an additional request?

I repeat, Mr. President, I think it important that this resolution should be put in a form where we will know, in the first place, what is intended—whether it is a request from the Senate or whether it is intended to have the effect of a law, which would require the cooperation of the other House. If it is to be the latter, then it ought not to use the word "request," but it ought to command. If it should be the former, in other words, simply a Senate resolution, then it ought to be limited to such things as the Senate can properly request or direct of the head of the Department of Commerce and Labor, and that is, to furnish information now in his possession or which may come into his possession. If you shall go further and direct him to procure information, you undertake to make investigations that require more than a request of the Senate.

Mr. REED. Mr. President—

Mr. BACON. I yield to the junior Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I merely wanted to ask the Senator a question, to get his views. I understand the Senator concedes that, with the exception of that part of the resolution which provides for an investigation into the action of the local authorities, the resolution only embraces those subjects which now by law it is made the duty of the Secretary to investigate and report upon. I think we agree upon that.

Mr. BACON. Yes; so far as I recollect the terms of the law; I have not it before me.

Mr. REED. It being, therefore, the situation that by a law of the United States the power is vested and the duty is imposed upon the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to make these investigations, does the Senator hold that there is any impropriety when a special matter arises for the Senate to request in a respectful way that a special investigation be made of that particular matter at once? Has not that been done over and over again by the Senate?

Mr. BACON. It may be, but it does not rest in my recollection.

Mr. REED. Have not requests been made of the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate and report and recommend with reference to various diseases of animals that were contagious?

Mr. BACON. I think not, but I may be mistaken. I think it will be found that he has been authorized or directed by law to make such investigations.

Mr. REED. I think it is a common practice. But if it were not a common practice, if we were without precedent, does the Senator hold that the law having imposed the right upon the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to make such investigations, there is any impropriety in the Senate requesting him to make a special investigation of a particular matter which is now before the country and pressing for attention? Is there any impropriety in that? I grant you if the man does not obey it he could probably not be punished, but is there any impropriety in making the request?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, according to my view, neither the Senate acting singly nor the Senate and House acting together ought to make a request where it has a right to make a command. It is the function of the Senate and of the House to pass laws. The Senate is entitled to all the information it needs for the purpose of enabling it to pass laws intelligently. For that reason, I say, if the Senate should see proper to have an investigation made of conditions there, with a view to giving it the information which it will need in the enactment of any law, I care not whether it is a law within its jurisdiction which affects labor or whether we pass a law which shall relate to customs duties, in either case the Senate has a right, or the two Houses acting together have a right, to set on foot such investigations as will get information which may be needed.

But I do insist, Mr. President, that there is no propriety, and, I think, no precedent for the proposition that where there is an existing law upon the statute books the Senate should pass a resolution requesting that an officer shall do what the law requires him to do. Of course, by joint resolution or by statute, if we think the officer is not performing his duty, we can require him to do it; but, Mr. President, that is a very different thing from either the House singly or the Senate singly preferring to him a request to obey the law. I say that is manifestly improper.

I would be very glad if the Senator from Washington would give us the information whether this is a Senate resolution or a joint resolution. If it is a Senate resolution, I repeat, it goes beyond the power of the Senate to request an officer to do something outside of his office; in other words, to do more than to give information, furnish papers, and so forth. We have a right to request and direct him to do that. If it is a joint resolution, then, Mr. President, it ought to be put in a form where it shall have the effect of law, and the word "request" ought not to be in it, but the word "direct" or the word "command" should be inserted. If the information is needed which is sought by this resolution, then it should be put in such shape that we would be sure to get it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, there is very important business pending before the Senate. This resolution has been discussed at great length, and I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire moves to lay the resolution on the table. It is not a debatable question.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I did not desire to debate that question; but I desire to answer the question asked me by the Senator from Georgia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair regrets to say that under the rules of the Senate that is not permissible.

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will permit the Senator from Washington to proceed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will withhold the motion so that the Senator from Washington may make a brief statement.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia dwells on the fact that the militia is a State force under the command of the State. The Senator shakes his head.

Mr. BACON. I can not hear the Senator. That is the reason why I shook my head.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate will please be in order.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I say the Senator from Georgia emphasizes the fact that the militia of the State of Massachusetts is not a Federal force, but is an agency of the State, with which, of course, I agree. But if the militia of the State, acting under the authority of the State, should undertake to stop a railroad train that was passing through that State into another State, I apprehend it would then be interfering with a function which the Federal Government has a right of control—interstate commerce.

Mr. BACON. Yes; I would say to the Senator in such a case the law prescribes the remedy through an appeal to the courts, and not to the legislative branch of the Government.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is for the purpose of gaining information upon which Congress might do what the Senator has so forcibly said it had the right to do, to command—I am not willing to go to that length, however—the executive department of the Government to perform its duty under the law, that the resolution is directed. If in the performance of the request contained in the resolution it should be disclosed, as it would be disclosed, that the military force of the State of Massachusetts, the police and the militia, had interfered with the free passage of orderly and law-abiding people from that State into another State, then, according to the Senator from Georgia, the Congress of the United States could instruct, could command, the executive department of the Government of the United States to take proper steps in the courts, as he says, or otherwise to see that interstate commerce was not interfered with.

The militia did not stop a train, but they stopped a large number of people who desired to ride upon the train, which to that extent was the same thing, and in principle and in effect as much an interference with interstate commerce as though they had obstructed the passage of the entire train. It is clearly within the jurisdiction of the United States Government.

The Senator says that the resolution would be perfectly proper if introduced for the purpose of obtaining information to be used in the discussion of the tariff bill. I do not understand that it is necessary—

Mr. BACON. No; The Senator will pardon me. I did not say that this particular form of resolution would be sufficient. I said that a resolution put in the proper shape for that purpose would be all right, but I never have said—at least I do not think I did; if I did I spoke inadvertently—that a resolution in this shape, a Senate resolution requesting an officer of the Government to do that which the law now requires him to do, not in the way of furnishing information or producing papers or anything of that kind, would be cured by the question as to the particular purpose it proposed. I simply said that if it was desired to procure information as to the wages of these strikers, or as to the number of foreigners, or any other question affecting labor entering into the manufacture of articles about which we were to legislate in the way of imposing a tariff, that would be a legitimate subject of inquiry, and that put in proper shape I would certainly support it myself. But I do not think I have said—I certainly did not so intend to say—that a resolution in this shape would be good if intended for that purpose, because I do not think it would be good for any purpose in this shape.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President—

Mr. POINDEXTER. Will the Senator indulge me just one minute? As I understand it, the effect of the argument of the Senator from Georgia is that at least that portion of the resolution which calls for information in regard to the millworkers in Lawrence, if put in proper form and addressed to the proper official of the Government, would be within the functions of the Senate, would be perfectly proper.

Mr. BACON. I think—

Mr. POINDEXTER. The result of that is that the Senate would not call upon any officer of the Government to furnish the information except some one who had no authority under the law to get it. He objects to the resolution because the officer to whom it is directed has authority under the law to do what the resolution requests him to do.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President—

Mr. GALLINGER. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire if he would be willing to withdraw that motion until the resolution can be perfected. There is a motion I made to strike out all after the word "countries" in line 8.

Mr. GALLINGER. I prefer that my motion should be put.

Mr. CULBERSON. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on tabling the resolution.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. For what purpose does the Senator from North Carolina rise?

Mr. SIMMONS. I rose to ask the Senator from New Hampshire if he would not withdraw his motion for a moment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Senator from New Hampshire has insisted upon his motion, which is not debatable.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should not be precluded from making my request on that account.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON]. I do not know how he would vote if present, and I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. CRAWFORD (when Mr. GAMBLE's name was called). I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. GAMBLE] is necessarily absent from the Senate on business. He is paired with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY]. He being absent, I will ask to withhold my vote.

Mr. PENROSE (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. RAYNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND].

Mr. RICHARDSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. BACON (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Georgia was called). My colleague [Mr. SMITH of Georgia] is necessarily detained from the Senate by personal illness.

Mr. STONE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK], who is absent from the Chamber. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SMOOT (when Mr. SUTHERLAND's name was called). My colleague [Mr. SUTHERLAND] is necessarily absent from the city. He has a general pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER].

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WETMORE. I desire to announce the pair of my colleague [Mr. LIPPITT] with the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA].

The roll call was concluded.

So the Senate refused to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I voted "nay" because I favor the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. I do not recognize anything unusual in the resolution of the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] in so far as it asks for information from the Department of Commerce and Labor regarding labor conditions in the State of Massachusetts. I favor the amendment of the Senator from Texas because I am unwilling to stigmatize as inefficient or impotent or unjust the local officers of the government of Massachusetts.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Will the Senator from Michigan yield for a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. POINDEXTER. This inquiry might result, if the facts warranted, in vindicating those officers. It must not necessarily stigmatize them. Whether, however, it would stigmatize them or not would depend altogether upon the conditions which existed.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I think in the exercise of the police powers of the State of Massachusetts we have no constitutional concern whatever. I see no reason in the world for imputing to those officers any failure to do their duty or for voluntarily intruding ourselves into a controversy solely within the power of that State to remedy.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, there could be no sufficient reason for the introduction of this resolution with the last clause of it eliminated, because I suppose that no Senator on the floor will pretend to think that the law as it stands does not cover all of the inquiries proposed, except the last one. The Senator from Washington understands that as well as I do, and he is too intelligent a Senator to attempt a vain or a useless thing. I was impressed by the speech which he made in favor of this resolution, with the belief that the one fact which he sought information upon was that the State of Massachusetts had failed in her duty.

I am of the opinion that without the last clause the Senator from Washington would not have introduced the resolution, and it was for that reason I voted to table the whole resolution. Undoubtedly, if it is to be passed at all, it ought to be passed without the concluding clause, because it would then do no more than to direct an officer of the Government to do what the law now makes it his duty to do.

While I am on my feet, Mr. President, I want to say that if I thought a sovereign State of this Union had failed to perform the duties assigned to it by the Constitution in such a way as to vest a jurisdiction, even of inquiry, in the Federal Government, I would never consent to order a subordinate officer of any department to prosecute that inquiry, but instead, sir, I would raise a committee of the Senate or a joint committee of the two Houses and intrust to them an inquiry of that importance and of that dignity.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I am not in favor of this resolution in its present form; but if the resolution is to be adopted at all—and I presume it will be in some form—I want that part of the resolution stricken out by which the Senate of the United States undertakes to direct a minor officer of this Government to inquire into the acts of a sovereign State of this Union. So much for that.

It has been said that the object of the resolution is determined by the last paragraph, which I have suggested, by my amendment, shall be stricken out. I do not know what the object of the Senator from Washington is except as I read the language employed by him in this resolution. What is that? That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall obtain and report to the Senate—

Full information concerning the condition of the mill workers in Lawrence, Mass., and especially those now engaged in strike—their wages and conditions of living; also what approximate percentage of these employees are subjects of foreign countries and of what foreign countries.

I should like to ask the Senate if that is not a substantive suggestion? There is some other object to this resolution besides inquiring what was done by the officers of the State government of Massachusetts. Do we want to inquire into the conditions of labor in Massachusetts? We have laws on the subject. Why do we want to inquire into the wages paid to these employees of the manufacturing industries in Massachusetts? So far as I am concerned, it is to obtain information upon which we can measure the tariff we ought to levy, and to see whether the object of the Republican protective tariff is indeed to give additional wages to American laborers or whether it is not a subterfuge, Mr. President, to enrich the manufacturers themselves by enabling them to employ cheap foreign labor, although it is employed in this country.

With reference to the suggestion which has been made by several Senators that the law already empowers and directs this inquiry to be made, what if it does? The object of this resolution, if I can amend it so as to accomplish my purpose, is to have an immediate inquiry and not leave it to the executive officers of the Department of Commerce and Labor to take their time about it and report to the Senate too late for action in the present inquiry on the subject of the tariff.

That, Mr. President, in substance, is why I have offered the amendment. I would rather see the proper committee of the Senate make this inquiry—the Finance Committee, for instance. I should like to see the officers of the Government volunteer and go immediately to make this examination now but I see no reason why the Senate of the United States should not request or even direct that the inquiry may be immediate in order that we may have the information promptly so as to determine the questions upon which we are now about to enter.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I am very glad that we shall be able to vote upon this resolution with the last clause stricken out. That part of it is very objectionable to me.

Mr. BACON. That has not yet been stricken out.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the motion, I understand, of the Senator from Texas. He proposes to make that motion.

Mr. CULBERSON. I have submitted it.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator has already submitted that motion and, therefore, we shall get an opportunity to vote for or against the resolution with that very objectionable provision stricken out.

There are two reasons to my mind why this resolution ought to be passed: The information that it seeks to secure will affect two very important subjects of legislation now pending before the Senate—one, the tariff, to which the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] has alluded; and the other, equally important, the restriction of immigration, to which the Senator from Texas did not allude.

It is true we have the report of the so-called Tariff Board on the subject of wool and woollens, but that report will not enlighten the Senate about conditions that exist in the woolen mills at Lawrence, Mass.; and if the conditions that exist in the woolen mills at Lawrence, Mass., are such as are described in an article that I shall presently read to the Senate, appearing in the last issue of a magazine called the Survey, written by Mr. W. J. Lauck, a member, I believe, of the Immigration Commission, then it is highly important that the Senate should be in possession of the information sought to be obtained by this resolution, not only for the purpose of enabling us intelligently to legislate upon the tariff schedules that affect wool and woollens, but also for the purpose of enabling us to decide intelligently the question of whether our immigration laws ought to be so amended as to prescribe additional tests for the purpose of excluding undesirable foreigners.

I want to read briefly from the article written by this authority. I said a little while ago he is a member of the Immigration Commission. He, together with Prof. Jenks, another member of the Immigration Commission, has written a book upon the subject investigated by that commission, which I have been reading, and which I find to be full of very valuable information.

This article appeared in the last issue of the Survey. I will not read all of it, but only a part. It says:

The Lawrence labor troubles have also been of unusual interest, for the reason that the industry around which they have centered is one of the chief beneficiaries of our protective system. The argument has long been made that the woolen and worsted goods manufacturing industry needed a high tariff in order to protect its wage earners from the products of the pauper labor of Europe. The recent development at Lawrence, however, has disclosed the fact that the so-called American wage earner, whose standard of living, it is claimed, must be upheld by the tariff, is largely a myth, and that in reality the American woolen-mill operatives are made up of "pauper workmen" of almost half a hundred of the immigrant races from the south and east of Europe and from Asia.

As a matter of fact, the term American wage earner is a misnomer, and in no industrial locality is this better illustrated than in Lawrence, the principal center of our worsted-goods mills. According to the last census this important textile manufacturing city had a population of 85,000, made up of the various races, as follows.

I will not read the table, but I will ask that it be incorporated with my remarks. It shows that of the 85,000 population in the city of Lawrence, Mass., only 12,000 are Americans, the balance being foreigners, and a large part of them being immigrants of recent arrival in this country from southern and eastern Europe.

English.....	9,000
French-Canadian.....	12,000
Polish.....	2,100
Hebrew.....	2,500
Syrian.....	2,700
Lithuanian.....	3,000
American.....	12,000
Irish.....	21,000
Scotch.....	2,300
German.....	6,500
Portuguese.....	700
Italian.....	8,000
Armenian.....	600
Franco-Belgian.....	1,200
Other races.....	1,400

Complete total..... 85,000

The numerical importance of the Polish, Portuguese, Italian, Syrian, Armenian, and Lithuanian races, all of recent arrival in the United States, is in strong contrast to racial conditions of a generation back.

Skipping a part of it, I read:

The racial composition of Lawrence and the racial displacements which have occurred in the worsted and woolen mills there are typical of other woolen goods manufacturing centers in New England. This has recently been disclosed by the United States Immigration Commission and the Tariff Board.

Only about one-eighth of the woolen and worsted mill operatives at the present time are native Americans. Slightly more than three-fifths are foreign born, chiefly recent immigrants from southern and eastern Europe. The remainder are the native-born children of parents who were born abroad. During the past 20 years the American and the British and northern European immigrants have been rapidly leaving the mills, owing to the pressure of the competition of the recent immigrant. The south Italian, Polish, and north Italian are the three principal races of southern and eastern Europe engaged in the industry, while the English, Irish, and German of the races of past immigration are represented in the largest numbers.

Of the foreign-born employees, about one-fifth of the males and two-fifths of the females have had experience in the same kind of work before coming to this country, while two-fifths of the male employees and one-third of the female have been farmers or farm laborers in their native countries. The average weekly wage of the male operatives, 18 years of age or over, is only $10.49, and of the female employees $8.18. The average annual earnings of male heads of families employed in the industry are only $400, and of all males 18 years of age or over $346.

Mr. President, I say the information we are likely to get, if this resolution passes, if this eminent authority has not misrepresented conditions at Lawrence, will not only be of great benefit to us in fixing the rate of duty that ought to be imposed upon wool and woolen goods, when we come to act upon that schedule of the tariff, but it will be exceedingly valuable to us in the consideration of the immigration bill that is now pending before Congress. While the committee have stricken out the literacy test, it is proposed to offer an amendment imposing that literacy test, and if the information given by this eminent writer and authority, who has given the last two or three years of his life chiefly to investigation of these subjects is true, then we have at Lawrence, Mass., the best and the most cogent reason why there ought to be some further restriction of immigration and why that restriction ought to include the literacy test, because in those mills are employed chiefly immigrants of those races that are the least educated and that constitute largely the illiterate element which is now crowding out of this industry our native laborer. I hope the resolution as amended by the Senator from Texas will pass.

Mr. BORAH obtained the floor.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President—

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. I thank the Senator from Idaho. I said a moment ago that the chief, and I presumed the only, purpose that moved the author of the resolution to present it was the inquiry into the attitude of the State; and I based that opinion upon the fact that all the other authority conferred by the resolution exists under the present law. The suggestion that this investigation will be made immediately finds no warrant in the resolution, because this officer is not directed or even requested to do that at once and report to the Senate. That officer is already charged with duties by the general law, and I very gravely doubt the power of the Senate to suspend the performance of those general duties and direct or request him to perform this special duty, if he has less time than both require.

But, Mr. President, with the indulgence of the Senator from Idaho, I wish to read the statement of the Senator from Washington when he presented the resolution to the Senate, and I think that will remove all doubt as to his purpose.

On page 2445 of the RECORD, the first two paragraphs of the remarks made by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] were as follows:

Mr. President, I desire to say, in connection with the resolution, that a condition has arisen, growing out of this strike in the city of Lawrence, which immediately involves the responsibility of the Federal Government. The local authorities have absolutely failed in the function which they are obliged to perform of guaranteeing the people who are involved in this strike the privileges and immunities of the Constitution of the United States.

A large number of these people are citizens of foreign countries. The fact that those people have been denied the privilege of free travel and free passage from one State to another State raises a situation which may at any moment become an international question, and with respect to which a foreign country can deal only with the United States.

No suggestion here of information upon which to base tariff or immigration laws. At that point I interposed the inquiry, which any Senator can find by following the debate, and the whole question turned on that. It was not only the resolution itself, which embodies no matter not now provided for by law except the inquiry whether Massachusetts was performing her duty, but it was the statement of the author of the resolution in the very first paragraph presenting his argument to the Senate which attracted my attention, and convinces me that the important part of the resolution is the last clause.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the criticism which has been lodged against the resolution as to its form seems to me to have some merit, in this—that the resolution, it seems to me, ought to direct this investigation, or order it, and there ought to be something to suggest a time within which the report should be made; and I should be glad, before the vote is taken, if such an amendment could be made to the resolution.

I apprehend there is no real purpose upon the part of the resolution or the mover of it to secure any facts which have relation to anything other than the labor conditions and the disturbance which prevail in the city of Lawrence, in the State of Massachusetts. So far as concerns the bearing it may have upon tariff legislation, I am not interested, and I doubt very much if anybody else is very particularly. Such information would be without value on that matter because of its incompleteness.

I presume the resolution had its origin in the news which the newspapers carried to the effect that the authorities of the States had prevented some of the citizens or residents of Massachusetts from going into another or adjoining State; and I presume everyone will concede that such a condition of affairs in this country would naturally call for inquiry by the proper body, whatever that body may be. For the authorities of a State to prevent a party from traveling from the State of Massachusetts or any other State into another State is something in which I think we might all be interested, at least to know by what authority they presumed to exercise such a power. I doubt not that this resolution had its origin solely in that news which was carried by the newspapers in regard to that fact.

My observation, Mr. President, has been that there can not be too much light thrown upon the labor troubles which occur sometimes in different parts of this country; and while I would not for a moment vote for a resolution, or support in any way a resolution, which would tend to take from the State authorities their authority to act until such time as the State authorities have requested such action upon the part of the National Government, my experience and my observation have been, nevertheless, that, so far as the revealing of the actual state of affairs is concerned, it is better for both sides that it be done, and be done by some impartial person.

Everyone knows that when these labor troubles come there are charges and countercharges; things are alleged to have been done which, perhaps, never were done; charges made which have no foundation; and it is almost impossible for those against whom the charges are made to have the facts presented to the American public in such a way that the public will accept them otherwise than by some impartial investigation or by some party who may go there disconnected with the controversy, impartial as to the conflict, and reveal the actual state of affairs to the public.

Without making any personal reference, I know that there have been conditions where those in charge of State affairs would have been most fortunate if they could have had the facts as they actually existed made known to the public; and I doubt not if the actual facts here are made known it will not be to the disadvantage of the State authorities. That has been my observation and my experience. It is the things which are reported to be true that are not true; it is a condition promulgated to the public which has no foundation; it is the charges laid without any just reason against officers who are seeking to do their duty that necessitate, in my judgment, an investigation as to the actual condition of affairs.

If the State officials are correct in their position; if they are assuming no other authority than that which they have a right to assume, instead of an investigation reflecting upon the State of Massachusetts or injuring her authorities, it will, in my judgment, be a credit and a distinct benefit to the State of Massachusetts to have the investigation made.

On the other hand, if it should turn out that the State authorities of Massachusetts are preventing people from going from that old Commonwealth to some other State, I do not agree with those who say we have no constitutional right to look into the question. I undertake to say when a State, or the State authorities, or those representing the State, undertake to prevent the passage of a resident or citizen of one State to another, it is not a matter of concern to that individual State alone, but it is a matter of supreme concern to the entire Nation, and the United States has the right to inquire into it. Indeed, the Supreme Court of the United States has held pointedly upon this question that it is not within the power of the State or the authorities of the State to interfere with the free passage of a citizen out of the State into another or through a State into another, and it is a matter of which the National Government should and can take cognizance; that it is a right which a man enjoys not alone as a citizen of Massachusetts, but as a citizen of the United States, to go hither and thither, as he chooses, unless there is lodged against him complaint of some crime or that he has violated some law.

If it be true that in the extraordinary condition of affairs which prevails in the State of Massachusetts the State authorities of that State, misconceiving their duty and making a mistake as to the policy, have undertaken to prevent people from leaving the State when there is no charge of crime against them, it is something we have a right to inquire into; not for the purpose, until the Governor or the legislature or both shall ask us to interfere, for the purpose of interfering—that is to say, for the purpose of taking control of the situation and policing the situation—but we certainly have a right to know what it is necessary to do in order to protect the free passage of citizens from one part of the country to another.

Mr. President, who is going to be injured thereby? In my opinion the State of Massachusetts will be distinctly benefited and her officers will be distinctly benefited if these charges are untrue. On the other hand, I say if they are true it must be conceded it is a thing about which we have a right to inquire, and too much light can not be thrown upon the conditions which prevail there. The light generally reveals a condition of affairs altogether different from that which is carried in popular news, because the news must necessarily come from one source or another, both of which are prejudiced in the matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 4 o'clock having arrived, the resolution goes to the calendar. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 3812) to regulate public utilities in the District of Columbia and to confer upon the Commissioners of the District of Columbia the duties and powers of a public-utilities commission.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President—

Mr. GALLINGER. I will agree that the unfinished business may be laid aside that the Senator from Massachusetts may address himself to some subject.

Mr. LODGE. I merely desire to say a word.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts was recognized.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I did not intend to say anything further on this matter, but I do not wish to have any misunderstanding in regard to my position. I said yesterday more than once that I had no objection to any publicity or any investigation whatever into general labor conditions in Lawrence, or the particular conditions surrounding this strike. Such an inquiry is fully provided for in the law of the United States—the act of 1888—which was read yesterday by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON]. The Commissioner of Labor has full power to examine into the strike now existing.

I voted to lay the resolution on the table simply and solely because it contains the clause in regard to the local authorities, and, Mr. President, I object and I shall resist—

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. CULBERSON. Will the Senator kindly read the extract from the statute to which he refers?

Mr. LODGE (reading):

The Commissioner of Labor is also specially charged to investigate the causes of and facts relating to all controversies and disputes between employers and employees as they may occur and which may tend to interfere with the welfare of the people of the different States, and report thereon to Congress.

That, as I have already said, gives him absolute and sweeping authority to make an investigation into all such cases as that now existing in Lawrence. But I object to bringing for trial before the bar of a commissioner, or the head of a bureau, what has been done by the authorities in my State. The governor of the State of Massachusetts is not of my party, but he is the executive of the Commonwealth, and I shall resist any attempt to bring his conduct for investigation or trial before the Commissioner of Labor, the head of a bureau, or any subordinate Federal official.

There is no evidence whatever that the State of Massachusetts has interfered with the operations of interstate commerce. It is said in the newspapers that the police of Lawrence stopped the sending away of certain children on Saturday last. I have also been informed—I heard, in fact, from my State—that they exceeded their authority in so doing, and that the State had taken means to correct it.

When it is shown that the State of Massachusetts is resisting the laws of the United States or interfering with them, then, and not till then, will the time come for the Congress of the United States and the Government of the United States to consider it. But I object, Mr. President, to bringing up the action of the authorities of the State to be looked over by the head of a bureau. I do not think we have any right to do it, and I know that it is utterly wrong and improper.

We do not, as a matter of fact, know anything about the situation in Lawrence except what has appeared in the newspapers. I think it would be well to wait before we censure or summon the authorities of the State until we have some better information. They are not looking for a vindication at the hands of the head of the Bureau of Labor or anybody else, and until something is presented to Congress more tangible than has yet been presented I think the Senate should hesitate long before it establishes a precedent that the authorities of a State are to be turned over to the head of a bureau to be investigated as to whether they have done their duty. What the State has done has had nothing to do with the conditions of labor or the conditions of the strike. It was the duty of the State to preserve order in Lawrence when there was rioting and disorder threatened in that city, and I do not think a resolution ought to be passed which brings them forward for trial, for that is what this resolution amounts to.

That is the reason why I voted against the resolution as it stands, and I shall continue to vote against it as it stands. If that clause about the authorities of the State is stricken out, I have no objection to its passing; but it is then wholly superfluous. It is simply telling the commissioner to do what he now has full authority to do without mandate or suggestion from us.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I ask permission to say a further word in regard to the matter.

It is needless for me to repeat what I have already said as to my objection to the resolution, particularly and basically on account of the last clause, which the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] proposes to strike out, nor to repeat the reasons which I gave as to the first part of the resolution on the ground that it is not properly framed, and so forth.

As the suggestion has been made that this information is needed for the purpose of legislation, either as to the enactment of a tariff law or as to the regulation of the subject of immigration, I want to say that if the resolution is put in proper shape and the proper authority is clothed with the investigation I shall vote for it. For that reason I shall suggest as the proper means of securing this information that there should be a committee of the Senate—and I will now say that if the resolution comes again before the Senate I intend to offer an amendment to the effect that the investigation shall be made by a committee or subcommittee of either the Finance Committee or the Committee on Immigration, and put in that shape and with that sustained by the Senate we shall then have an authoritative investigation.

There is much in what the Senator from Massachusetts has just said as to the impropriety of sending a subordinate officer of an executive department of the Government to investigate the internal affairs of a State.

Therefore, Mr. President, if this is a matter of importance—and Senators here evidence that it is, in their opinion, a matter of importance—let us treat it as a matter of importance and clothe the proper committee of the Senate with power to make the investigation. It is not now in order that I should offer the amendment, but, I repeat, if the matter again comes before the Senate I shall offer an amendment clothing a committee of the Senate with power to make the investigation so far as relates to the first part of the resolution. But, so far as the resolution relates to the action of officials of the State of Massachusetts, I do not think it is a proper matter for investigation here by an officer of a bureau or by a subcommittee of the Committee on Finance or any other committee of the Senate, unless the State of Massachusetts is in some way transcending its constitutional authority or is violating its obligations to the General Government.

PUBLIC UTILITIES COMMISSION.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the unfinished business may be laid before the Senate.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the unfinished business be stated.

Mr. BURTON. I should like to ask if the Senator from New Hampshire will postpone his request for a few minutes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to have the unfinished business laid before the Senate, and then the Senator can prefer his request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The unfinished business will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 3812) to regulate public utilities in the District of Columbia and to confer upon the Commissioners of the District of Columbia the duties and powers of a public-utilities commission.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri gave notice that he would desire to be heard at this time. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Ohio temporarily?

Mr. STONE. How much time does the Senator wish?

Mr. BURTON. I think not more than three minutes.

Mr. STONE. Unless it is very important I would rather not yield.

Mr. BURTON. I will state that it is important, because it relates to an extension bill, the operation of which expires March 1, and there will have to be a conference between the House and Senate.

Mr. STONE. I am always desirous of showing the utmost courtesy, but there is a situation that I fear makes it rather improper for me to yield.

Mr. BURTON. I do not wish to interfere or to take any considerable time if the Senator desires to address the Senate. Is that the intention of the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. STONE. What I desire to do is this: I gave notice yesterday that I would address the Senate at this time, but at the request of the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] I intend to yield to him. I have just stated to him that I would yield; and I will take my chances of making such observations as I have in mind to make when he is through, or to-morrow at the close of the morning business.

Mr. BURTON. I withdraw the request until the Senator from Maryland has had an opportunity to make remarks.

"THE CHARTER OF DEMOCRACY" AS ADVOCATED BY EX-PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT AT THE OHIO CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, I hope in what I am about to say to-day upon the subject that I have announced, that the Senate will understand that I am not influenced by any political considerations whatever, because I believe that our party will succeed in the next presidential contest no matter who may be nominated by the Republican convention. I have another purpose to subserve entirely, and that is to present to this body my views upon a proposition that was advanced by ex-President Roosevelt before the constitutional convention of the State of Ohio a few days ago in an address entitled "The Charter of Democracy," and which I regard as the most dangerous doctrine ever brought forward by anyone who has the slightest regard for the stability of our institutions and whose opinion is entitled to any weight or respect.

In this address of the ex-President there are a number of suggestions, such as the election of Senators by the people and primary elections for the nomination of political candidates, with which I entirely agree. What I desire to call attention to to-day is a unique and original conception which he advanced upon this occasion and which I quote literally, as follows:

The decision of a State court on a constitutional question should be subject to revision by the people of the State.

If any considerable number of the people feel that the decision is in defiance of justice, they should be given the right by petition to bring before the voters at some subsequent election, special or otherwise, as might be decided, and after the fullest opportunity for deliberation and debate, the question whether or not the judge's interpretation of the Constitution is to be sustained. If it is sustained, well and good.

If not, then the popular verdict is to be accepted as final, the decision is to be treated as reversed, and the construction of the Constitution definitely decided—subject only to action by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. President, if a proposition of this sort had been advanced by an ordinary agitator or by an anarchist no attention would be paid to it; the people would understand that it was utterly meaningless, and it would involve no actual danger to the Republic. We must realize, however, that this is the utterance of a political leader, who occupies to-day as prominent a place before the public as anyone in the country, who is gifted with tremendous power, who commands great popularity, and who for seven years occupied the position of President of the United States, and who is now a candidate again for the office.

I would like to accept the apology that has been offered for him by one of the leading papers of the country, when it says:

We shall pay Mr. Roosevelt the compliment of stating that we do not think that he believes a word of the nonsense he uttered in this speech.

But I can not do so. I would rather accept the criticism of another great paper, which observes in its editorial columns as follows, in commending to the attention of everybody this salient feature of his address:

We beg leave to remark that it is the most astonishing and in the view of healthy intelligence the craziest proposal that ever emanated either from himself or from any other statesman since the organization of our Government by law.

I am inclined to think that the last criticism goes perhaps a little too far when it says that it is the craziest proposal that ever emanated from himself, because I have from time to time taken the liberty to submit to the Senate a number of other proposals of the ex-President which are equal to it in this regard. I want it to be known that I am very fond of the ex-President, and whenever I have had occasion to comment upon any of his constitutional views I have always done so with the greatest deference and respect.

What I would really like to know now is, not as a matter of curiosity but for my own information, whether any man of intelligence, in his sober moments of thought and reflection, agrees with him in this contemplated change that he proposes to make in the nature of our institutions. I would like some Member of the Senate to arise here now, or at any time hereafter, and announce to the country and to his constituents that he believes in the doctrine that popular verdicts should supersede judicial construction upon constitutional questions.

I would like to arise, for instance, before the people of my State—and I represent as intelligent and patriotic a constituency as there is in the Union—and address them as follows: "Fellow citizens, whenever the Court of Appeals of Maryland decides that an act of the General Assembly of Maryland is unconstitutional, then the decision shall be submitted to the people, and if the people at a popular election, by a majority of their suffrages, decide otherwise, then the court shall be reversed and the decision set aside." What do you suppose, Mr. President, they would do with me? What disposition would they make of me, and where would they send me to?

Just let us grasp this appalling announcement for a moment, and, if we can, let us realize that it was deliberately made after the most thorough preparation and with an actual purpose in the mind of its author that if again invested with the reins of power he would, with all the influence that he can command, advocate to the people of the States that they should, by constitutional amendment or otherwise, put it into practical execution. I am not speaking as a partisan now, and I assure you upon my honor that I do not want to do anything that may weaken the chances of Mr. Roosevelt for a renomination at the hands of his party, because I do not believe that our party could have an easier opponent to defeat than a candidate who, by an inflammatory proposal of this character, has arrayed against himself the united intelligence of the country.

I am speaking of this declaration from an entirely nonpartisan view so as to present, if I can, to my countrymen, the overwhelming peril that confronts them if any man, to whatever party he may belong, who entertains such an idea of our institutions should again at any time or under any circumstances be invested with the administration of our affairs. I would like to go a step farther than this and ask if in any civilized country where anarchy does not prevail such a scheme of outlawry has ever been suggested upon all the pages of history.

People who regard this merely as a flippant and impulsive utterance of a candidate for public office who is trying to attract public favor are making a great mistake. In my judgment, the ex-President has been reflecting over this proposition for years, and contrary to his usual custom it is the result of profound study and investigation upon his part of the judicial history of the country. He has always been hostile to the decisions of the courts whenever they conflicted with his own views, and he has over and over again, in private and in public, given expression to his opposition to them. I can recall statement after statement that he has made upon this identical subject, and his reappearance now for public favor indicates to me that he is willing in this particular to identify himself before the people as the apostle of destruction and to aim with all his energies and with unerring precision at the judiciary of the country for the purpose of leveling the distinctions of the Constitution and destroying as far as possible the most sacred department of American institutions.

It is folly to tell me that he will exercise no influence with the people of the States if he succeeds in accomplishing his present ambition. No living man wields the power to-day that he does with a certain class of their citizenship. If it were not for this and if I thought that this utterance was merely an impetuous outburst, I would pass it by and let it die at its birth. This I know is not the case, and I speak of my own personal knowledge when I say that an idea is firmly implanted in his mind that if he ever again has the power he will do all that lies within his reach to effect the identical purpose that he has thus indicated, and I therefore take him at his word. You will observe that he is very careful in what he says and that his proposition is not to take away from the courts either by constitutional amendment or otherwise their power to construe an act of the legislature. His idea is to leave that power where it is in the courts, and though their decisions may be in perfect accord with the law and with the Constitution and with the authorities, nevertheless to give to the people the right to reverse their judgments and decrees and from day to day, by popular verdicts, to make constitutions of their own. Of course it follows as a necessary corollary that if they can do this with the decisions of the courts they can do it with enactments of the legislature, and therefore at one fell swoop not only the judicial but the law-making power would lie prostrate at our feet.

If a legislature in any State should pass a law confiscating private property and deprive men of their earnings and possessions honestly and legitimately acquired without any compensation or by any process of law, and appellate tribunals should determine that such an act was in violation of the organic law of the land, then the people would have the right to meet upon a town lot or in a convention hall or at a popular ballot and set aside the solemn decrees of their judicial tribunals. In other words, public clamor, public agitation, and the appeals of demagogues are to deprive the courts of their highest functions and enable the people to take the law into their own hands whenever the rights of property or the liberty of individuals may be involved, with this pacifying modification of the scheme, that this attack upon our institutions must stop at the doors of the Supreme Court of the United States. Why, I ask, at the Supreme Court? The Supreme Court is the very tribunal that Mr. Roosevelt has mercilessly attacked whenever it has dared to disagree with him in his interpretation of the law. Why not have complete anarchy? Why have only partial anarchy? Why not carry this beautiful system to the utmost limit of its complete perfection? I insist upon it that you have no right to stop at the threshold of the Supreme Court, and I submit to the ex-President that in order to perfect the symmetry of his plan and to have perfect harmony in its arrangement whenever the Supreme Court renders a decision that is not in absolute accord with his own views, if he should happen to be President, that he summon to the ballot box the people of the United States to set aside the judgment of the court, and, if his motion is seconded and it meets with popular approval, let him issue a proclamation that the motion is carried and the decision is reversed.

A justice of the peace followed this plan in our earlier days in one of our States. A prisoner was before him for murder upon a preliminary hearing. The office of the justice was thronged with friends of the prisoner. After the testimony was concluded the counsel for the prisoner said, "Your honor, I make a motion that the prisoner be discharged." In all of his practice the justice had never heard of a motion, and he did not know what to do with it. Deliberating upon it for a few moments, he said, "Gentlemen, is there a second to the motion?" The motion was seconded. "Now, gentlemen, you have heard the motion. All in favor of it say 'aye.'" The motion was unanimously carried, and the prisoner was acquitted.

Mr. President, what is the use of having any courts at all? What is the use of having any constitution? Why did the framers of the Constitution say that—

The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain or establish?

Why did they not say that the judicial power shall be vested in the people? Mr. Roosevelt says the people made the Constitution, now let them interpret it. This is the substance of his argument, if it can be dignified by the name of argument. This is the hallucination that he is trying to inculcate in the minds of the rising generation. This is the new revelation of which he is the prophet and the messiah. Mr. President, where did the people ever make a constitution? Give me an instance of it. I challenge him. They have ordained, they have established, and they have ratified, but where have they ever made a constitution?

He forgets that in every constitution that has ever been adopted in these United States the people, through their representatives, in convention or otherwise, have established the forum that is to interpret the constitution that they have ordained. The people change from day to day, but the tribunal that they have constituted to interpret the law lives forever.

Now, there is a motive for all this, and there is a cause for this attack upon the institutions of the land. I think I can tell you what it is. It arises from the fact that when Mr. Roosevelt was President he was not allowed to influence and control the decisions of the courts, and they declined to pass under the domination of his arbitrary and imperious will. Of course, judges are only human; they have made mistakes and their adjudications are not divine; but one thing they have done to their eternal credit, and that is that they have stood as a barrier between him and dictatorial usurpation.

During the whole of his administration he had an idea lingering in his mind that it was the duty of the courts to carry out the policy of the executive branch of the Government, and this belief was connected with another idea, and that was that, so far as executive functions were concerned, he was absolutely supreme, unlimited by the specifications of the instrument that created them. I recall an incident that occurred during his administration that illustrates the point that I am now making.

Some few years ago, during his reign, a prominent member of the New York bar delivered an address before the New York Bar Association, contending against Webster, and the most profound and illustrious statesman that this country has ever produced, that when the Constitution invests executive power in the President it gives him unlimited executive power, and that he was in no manner bound by the delegated powers assigned to him in the instrument, and that he had the same prerogative as the Czar of Russia or any potentate of the most absolute monarchy. When the President heard of this address, he sent for the author of this frantic proposition, embraced him, extended to him the hospitalities of the Executive Mansion, showered upon him his presidential benedictions, and informed him that he was the only lawyer whom he had ever met who had the proper conception of the Constitution of the United States.

Now, what is the present situation? Mr. Roosevelt is a candidate for President of the United States. There was no need of any persuasion whatever to induce him to enter the field. There was no dragging of Cincinnatus from the plow, and there was no necessity that any Mark Antony should thrice upon the Lupercal offer him the crown. He is willing to come with his own crown and frame a constitution of his own in accordance with the charming and alluring platform that he has promulgated. I do not know what sort of a new party we will have if he is nominated and elected. We have quite a number of parties on hand now. There are Republicans and Democrats and insurgents and progressives and radicals and reactionaries and neurotics and paranoiacs, and another party will only add to the gayety and festivities of the entertainment. I have written some brief amendments to the Constitution for him, which I believe that he will accept if he will examine them carefully, and I would like to tender them to him so that if he is again called to the throne he can incorporate them in his message to Congress; and as I am satisfied Congress will pass them, they can then be submitted to the people in the shape of constitutional amendments. They do away with a great deal of unnecessary intermediary process between the executive and legislative branches of the Government, and they send a simple proposition to the American people which they will readily comprehend.

I, Theodore Roosevelt, in order to properly govern the people who have called upon me to preside over their destinies, to establish justice, insure tranquility, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty do hereby recommend the following amendments to the Constitution, to the Congress of the United States:

ARTICLE 1. Executive power: Whereas it has been established by congressional precedent and judicial authority that in the exercise of executive power I am limited by the specifications of the Constitution; and

Whereas this interpretation ignorantly acquiesced in for over 100 years does not at all accord with my views upon the subject, now I recommend the following amendment to the Constitution, to be voted upon by the people:

All executive power of every sort and description at any time exercised by anyone shall be vested in me, and any interference with or criticism of the exercise of any power that I may consider myself invested with shall be construed as treason and punishable as such.

ART. 2. Judicial power: Whereas the courts of the United States and the appellate courts of the different States have at various times rendered decisions upon constitutional questions which have not at all met with my approval and which are contrary to my policies as Executive of the United States, it is therefore herein provided that in order to remedy this defect and to make these decisions conform to my own interpretation of the Constitution, that whenever any of the appellate courts of the States, or the Supreme Court of the United States, shall decide a constitutional question an appeal or writ of error shall lie to me, and whatever interpretation I may place upon the constitution of any State or upon the Constitution of the United States, shall be final and no further appeal shall be allowed.

ART. 3. Dormant legislative powers: Whereas the Congress of the United States has failed to exercise from time to time a large number of Federal powers upon the ground that such powers are not delegated in the Constitution; and whereas this is a mistaken interpretation of the Constitution and there ought to be some tribunal that can exercise these powers for the general welfare of the people, therefore I recommend to the Congress of the United States the following amendment: "All dormant Federal powers not exercised by the Congress of the United States shall vest in me. The following powers are herein specifically enumerated. I shall have the right to grant charters to corporations and supervise their transactions; to issue interstate marriage licenses and to grant limited and unlimited divorces and permits for individuals to transact business; to define the amount of property that any one person shall own and what amount of business he shall transact; to superintend all the domestic affairs of the Nation; to prescribe the amount and quality of food that they shall consume; and to establish rules for the increase of population, prescribing the number of children that each family must contain, and provide adequate penalties for failure to attain the proper limit.

ART. 4. All Executive powers of every sort, kind, and description and wherever situate and being, whether active or dormant, not herein delegated to me by these amendments are reserved to me, and I shall have the right at any time to submit to myself for my rejection or approval such further amendments to the Constitution as I may deem proper, so that I may more effectually carry out the designs and purposes herein indicated and so that I may at all times insure absolute peace and tranquillity among the people whom I have been called upon to govern.

You know what I believe, Mr. President? I believe that there are a large number of Mr. Roosevelt's followers in this country who would to-day favor vesting in him autocratic power. Our institutions underwent a radical change under his administration. He inaugurated a new era of constitutional thought. He announced over and over again, in defiance of the unbroken decisions of the courts, that under the general-welfare clause of the Constitution Congress had the power to enact any legislation that tended to the general welfare of the Nation. He disclaimed upon inherent rights, when the Supreme Court had by an irrevocable line of decisions anchored the proposition in our constitutional history that we are strictly and literally a government of delegated power. He trespassed upon the rights of the States and in one public utterance after another perverted the Constitution so as to encroach upon their functions and invade their jurisdiction. The only department that saved us from dictatorial government was the judicial power of the States and of the Nation. Now it is proposed to practically deprive them of their constitutional functions. As this seditious proposal flashed through the country it shocked and appalled its intelligence, but, Mr. President, it has attracted an attentive audience, because the ex-President has whole battalions of loyal disciples who follow his leadership with the same discipline that an army follows its commander.

I want to say this: I agree with him in a great many things that he advocates. I am for progression and not for reaction. I am for the rights of the people against the domination of their political masters. This has been my familiar theme during the whole of my public career. To-day the people are in the field, and the day of the political manager is over and the hour of the patriot and the statesman has arrived. We can see with the naked eye that a great revolution is in progress, and that this is the age of political liberty and legislators; and Representatives and Senators are being warned that they are the servants and not the masters of the people. Down with the walls and back to the people, wherever it can be done without undermining the institutions of the Republic. It is because I am for these things with all sincerity that I have arisen to deprecate this unfortunate delusion that Mr. Roosevelt has brought to the front. It injures the cause of the people's rights.

Even now the students of our colleges and universities who are studying the science of government and the framework of our institutions are inquiring what does this inflammatory effusion portend. I received a communication to-day asking me to explain its scope and effect, and I answered that its only scope and effect was to distract and derange the mind of anyone who attempted to reconcile it with the cardinal principles of the Republic. I received another letter from a young man telling me he was studying to get to the United States Senate and asking me which side I was on upon this question. I will receive a score of these inquiries within the next few days. What sort of a Senate will this be in the years to come if the minds of the rising generation are to be bewildered by such incendiary utterances as this?

No progressive leader in this body that I know of has ever given expression to such views. The senior Senators from Wisconsin and Iowa, both of whom have been strongly indorsed for the presidential nomination, have never raised such an issue. They are men of sincere purpose and of deep convictions, and they have never undertaken to sap and undermine the foundations upon which the Republic rests. I had hoped that outbreaks like this were over when Mr. Roosevelt abdicated his place a few years ago and started upon his restful and harmless expedition to the jungles of Africa to slaughter animals that Providence had never created. I had hoped that he might remain there and not return and start these frenzied schemes again. Here he is, however, and he has come to stay. I do not know what we will do with our friend. Would it be possible, if he consents, to tender him to the new Republic of China, in the event of his defeat—and I am satisfied that, even if nominated, he will be easily defeated. I would almost be willing to make a new treaty for Chinese immigration if they would accept him in exchange. This would be a splendid opportunity for him to start a Chinese constitution framed upon the plan that he has outlined. Of course, we will miss him—there is no doubt about that—and the exhilarating commotion and excitement that he is constantly treating us to. The newspapers will miss him. He is the most valuable asset of American journalism that ever made his appearance in this land. I will miss him personally, because I like him and he has been a constant source of interest and amusement to me. I regard him as the most unique and picturesque character in all American history. When he was President I was constantly beguiled and diverted by his political performances.

I never retired at night that I did not expect some political earthquake in the morning, and I never arose in the morning that I did not look for some volcanic eruption at night. I think he is a most captivating and charming person. He can talk to you by the hour upon subjects that he does not know anything about at all with the same ease and facility that he can discuss those to which he has devoted the closest study. This is a gift of Providence that none of his predecessors ever possessed. His dissertations upon the Constitution are a feast of reason and a flow of soul. The last conversation I had with him was in relation to the case of Col. Stewart, whom he had charged with certain temperamental infirmities, and in whose behalf I had asked for a court of inquiry in the Senate. He informed me that being Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States he would not pay the slightest attention to any law that Congress passed, and that he had a perfect right, if he wanted to, to sentence Col. Stewart to death; that he did not intend to do it, but that he had the constitutional right to do so.

Mr. President, this is exactly the line of thought that he has followed in his address before the constitutional convention of Ohio.

He is simply advocating martial law. The best definition of martial law is that it is no law at all. When people are ordered to assemble in their polling places to set aside the solemn judgments of the courts that involve the rights of property and the liberty of our citizens and to trample upon precedent and order and authority, then we have an era of martial law. No one supposes for a moment that Mr. Roosevelt could carry a revolutionary system of this sort into operation. That is not the point. The point is that he would use every power at his command to strengthen the executive arm of the Government and compel the Federal judiciary to fall in line with his policies. Whenever he is to make appointments to the Supreme Court and to the various Federal circuits or is to select an Attorney General for his Cabinet, he will have a distinct understanding and ascertain definitely before the appointments are determined upon that his nominees are in accord with him upon constitutional construction and executive power. We know what he will do in the future from our experience in the past. He held his party in Congress under absolute vassalage and subjection, and he will revive his attempt to place the judiciary under his influence and control.

Make no mistake. I am not exaggerating the situation. He is perfectly sincere, and his motive is not a corrupt one, and he will do this because he is possessed with a mad fancy that this is and ought to be an Executive Government, that the powers of the Executive ought to override those of the legislative and judicial branches of the public service; and what he proposes is not by constitutional amendment, because he knows he can not procure it, but by all the patronage and all the power and all the resources that he can command to practically force upon the country an interpretation of our organic law that will level its distinctions and mutilate and obliterate its checks and balances. He will then, in the pursuit of his own insatiable ambition, possess a degree of autocratic power that no President of these United States has ever attained or would have ever dared to exercise, except at the risk of impeachment. Speaking for my country and not for my party, speaking for the autonomy and stability of our institutions, speaking for the Constitution in all of its parts, if we are to pass in again under his yoke, with his outstretched arm under his latest utterance hanging over the seat of justice, the refuge and bulwark of our institutions, ready to strike it down with a wanton attack upon its integrity, and if this attack is to succeed and the era of the common law is to be revived, when its judges were the abject serfs and slaves of the Crown, then, in my judgment, it would have been better if the Constitution had never been framed and its authors had never attempted by an apportionment of constitutional functions almost perfect in their allotment to construct an indissoluble Union of indestructible States.

AFFAIRS IN MEXICO.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I gave notice on yesterday that I would address the Senate to-day on a resolution I have heretofore offered relating to the conditions prevailing along the border between this country and Mexico. Circumstances have made it impracticable for me to do so to-day. The hour is now too late. If I can find opportunity, without trespassing upon more important business of the Senate to-morrow, I give notice that I shall then address the Senate at the conclusion of the routine morning business.

WATERS OF NIAGARA RIVER.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I again ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 232) extending the operation of the act for the control and regulation of the waters of Niagara River, for the preservation of Niagara Falls, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. The joint resolution had been reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, with an amendment, on page 2, line 5, after the word "to," to strike out "May 1, 1912," and insert "January 1, 1914," so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the provisions of the aforesaid act be, and they are hereby, extended from March 1, 1912, being the date of the expiration of said act, to January 1, 1914.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the preamble.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I find two errors in the preamble as it came to us, and I move to amend it by striking out the word "expired" before the word "March" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "and further extended to"; and after the words "August 22, 1911," to insert the words "expires March 1, 1912." It is clearly an error in the print in the form in which the joint resolution came to us.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the preamble is amended as suggested by the Senator from Ohio, and without objection the preamble as amended is agreed to.

KOOTENAI RIVER BRIDGES, MONTANA.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3776) permitting the board of county commissioners of Lincoln County, State of Montana, to construct, maintain, and operate three bridges across the Kootenai River in the State of Montana, which were, on page 1, line 6, after "River," to insert "at points"; on page 1, line 7, after "navigation," to strike out "at the following points" and insert "located as follows"; and on page 2, line 19, to strike out "bill" and insert "act."

Amend the title so as to read: "An act granting the consent of Congress to the board of county commissioners of Lincoln County, State of Montana, to construct, maintain, and operate three bridges across the Kootenai River in the State of Montana."

Mr. DIXON. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 12 minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 28, 1912, at 2 o'clock p. m.

TUESDAY, February 27, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father of light and love, justice and mercy, righteousness and peace, help us, we beseech Thee, to quell the tumult which sometimes surges within us and threatens the very citadel of the soul; that with patience, calmness, and serenity we may meet the conflicts which rage round about us and quit ourselves like men in the great battle of life, under the sublime leadership of the Lord Christ our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE SIXTEENTH AMENDMENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the governor of North Dakota:

LAWRENCE (MASS.) LABOR STRIKE.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 433.

Whereas there is a strike in progress in Lawrence, Mass.; and Whereas it is alleged that the police power of the city of Lawrence and the militia of the State of Massachusetts are being used to forcibly prevent parents from sending their children into other States, where arrangements have been made to take care of them until the strike is over; and

Whereas it is further alleged that many of these children do not belong to parents who are on strike, and many others have been secured either by intimidating the parents or by the grossest misrepresentation, made possible because many of the strikers are foreigners and do not understand our language; and

Whereas if the first allegation is true, it is a violation of the fourth and fourteenth amendments to the Constitution and the inherent right of citizens to travel from State to State: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Labor, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to investigate thoroughly the allegations set forth in the preamble of this resolution and the causes which have produced such a condition of affairs.

Said committee, or any subcommittee thereof, is hereby authorized to sit during the sessions of Congress either at Washington or at Lawrence, Mass., to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to employ such stenographic and clerical assistance as may be necessary for the purpose of carrying out the provisions and purposes of this resolution, and that the expenses thereof, in a sum not to exceed in the aggregate $10,000, be paid from the contingent fund of the House on vouchers ordered by said committee, signed by the chairman thereof, and approved by the Committee on Accounts. Said committee shall make a full report to this House as to whether, by reason of any facts thus ascertained, there shall be legislation by Congress with reference thereto.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I hope the gentleman will not object. Every Member of this House is familiar with the statements which have been carried in the press relative to the situation in Lawrence, Mass.—statements which, if true, show a horrible condition existing in that city, a condition which is a disgrace to the fair name of Massachusetts.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GILLETT. May I ask by what title the gentleman has the right to address the House?

The SPEAKER. He has not any, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. GILLETT. I was not here when the gentleman rose. Has he asked unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. He has asked unanimous consent, and it has not been granted.

Mr. GILLETT. Did he ask unanimous consent to address the House?

The SPEAKER. He asked unanimous consent for the consideration of this resolution, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] reserved the right to object.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the beginning of this resolution, but I assume by the end of it that it is a request to investigate some of the occurrences at Lawrence. I feel that the State of Massachusetts is able to cope with that matter, and for the present I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the fortifications appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 20111) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, with Mr. SIMS in the chair.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose last night there was pending an amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON], to which a point of order had been reserved. If the gentleman desires to discuss the merits of the provision, I will withhold making the point of order pending such discussion.

Mr. JACKSON. I thank the gentleman. Will the Clerk again report the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 5, at the end of line 5, add: "Provided, That no contract for the purchase of any such armament shall be let in any case where the Government can manufacture the same at a less cost, except only for such armament as it may be necessary to procure in addition to the capacity of the Government to manufacture at its arsenals."

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, the Army and Navy of the United States, including our fortifications and all equipment for fighting, should constitute, in my judgment, a great engine for self-defense. It is by this bill that we are supposed to lay the foundation of that defense and the keels of the vessels that are to protect us from foreign invasion. The philosophers of history tell us that there is no truer test of civilization of a nation than the organization of its army. If its army be organized for conquest, it may be set down as a military power. On the other hand, if the military organization is one for self-defense, the minds of the people are turned to their own institutions, the minds of the people are turned to the improvements in agriculture, to arts and sciences and the general improvement of its people.

Now, I have no fault to find in the main with this bill. I believe that it carries out this purpose of preparing in an orderly way, in a progressive way, for self-defense. But we have here a provision which authorizes the expenditure of $600,000 for the purchase, manufacture, and test of mounted field and siege cannon, or for the machinery necessary to manufacture this equipment.

The purpose of this amendment is to make it necessary that the Chief of Ordnance shall determine that he is unable to manufacture these in the arsenals of the United States. Now, I say that in laying the foundation of defense, aside from the question of economy, you could do nothing which is more to the point and which will tend to more strongly provide for the defense of the Nation than to train our men so that in times of crises we can manufacture the things we need for the defense.

I need only to refer to the speech of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], in which it is shown that this equipment can be manufactured from 25 to 127 per cent cheaper by the Government than it can be by contract and purchase.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman does not mean 127 per cent cheaper; that would be nothing and something less.

Mr. JACKSON. I mean what the table shows. The table shows that it costs the Government 127 per cent more to purchase it than to make it.

Mr. PAYNE. That is a different statement.

Mr. JACKSON. That is starting with the basis of the figures and the per cent added.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me, where does he find that statement?

Mr. JACKSON. On pages 2482 and 2483 of the RECORD. I will not stop to read it in detail because the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] gave it yesterday in an eloquent and learned speech.

I want to say now on this point of order that this is not subject to a point of order because it goes to the expenditure of the very money mentioned in this section and is a condition of the appropriation itself. As the bill now reads it reads that the Chief of Ordnance may use this money to purchase this upon contract or he may purchase the machinery to make it with. What I propose is that he shall not do the latter. He shall not purchase or make any contract to buy unless he finds that it is impossible to make it because of the inadequacy of the arsenal or the incapacity of the arsenals of the United States.

Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois on my right [Mr. McKINNEY], if it did not apply directly to the expenditure of this money it would be within the Holman rule, which tends to reduce expenditures, and in the very appropriation itself. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I have already stated my views as to what should be the policy of the Government, in the amount it should manufacture, and how much it should purchase of armament. I now make the point of order against the amendment, and I suggest to the Chair that it is not a limitation upon the appropriation within the meaning of the rule. It does not undertake to place a limitation on the moneys directly, but it does undertake to require of an officer the ascertainment of certain conditions, upon the ascertainment of which he shall take certain action, which is a change of existing law to that extent, and therefore it is not in order.

It does not appear, also, that it will necessarily decrease the expenditures, and is not in order, in my judgment, under the Holman rule.

Mr. JACKSON. Will the gentleman yield a minute on the discussion of the point of order? I want to make this additional suggestion, Mr. Chairman: That aside from the Holman rule this proposed amendment will make it necessary for the Chief of Ordnance to find that the arsenals are not adequate to do the work, whereas as the bill now reads he has his own will; he can make these contracts and leave the arsenals of the United States absolutely idle; and there is a statement in the remarks of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] showing for the last year the capacity has not been more than half or two-thirds occupied. Now, on the point that this amendment changes existing law. This amendment does not change existing law at all, but it simply says how this money which is now appropriated shall be used.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's own statement convicts him. He says at present the Chief of Ordnance may let such work out as he sees fit, whereas under this proposed provision he will be required to ascertain what work can be done in the arsenals and only the remainder can be let out, and thereby his power and duties are changed, which is a change of existing law.

Mr. JACKSON. They are under the appropriation as it is proposed.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is just it; the provision as proposed in the bill is in accordance with the existing law. Now, the provision, as it will be if amended by the amendment of the gentleman, takes from the officer that discretion, requiring of him the ascertainment of a fact and upon the ascertainment of that fact he shall do certain things, and to that extent it changes existing law.

Mr. JACKSON. It is certainly within the competency of Congress to do that.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky, with reference to the point of order, and that is under the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas, does not the fact that the Chief of Ordnance shall only spend such money as the arsenals can not use in manufacturing, necessarily involve a reduction of expenditures?

Mr. SHERLEY. Not at all.

Mr. PEPPER. For the reason that the arsenals are manufacturing these guns a good deal cheaper than at the present time they can be bought, and this limitation compelling him to use this money in the Government arsenals necessarily reduces expenditures to the extent of economizing the entire plant of the Government.

Mr. SHERLEY. My answer to the gentleman is that that is argumentative and does not appear in the face of the law as it is, and there is nothing there to show that the work is done cheaper in the arsenals than outside. Neither is there anything in the law showing what quantity is done in the arsenals and what outside. The present law would permit all work to be done in the arsenals, and therefore it can not be argued that a provision which does not give full discretion to an officer is necessarily a provision in the line of economy.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HOUSTON). The Chair is of the opinion that the amendment is not such a limitation of the expenditure of this money as falls within the rule. In order that the provision of this amendment be carried out it would be necessary for the executive officers to take affirmative action to make the investigation and find out certain things. Now, we find in Hinds' Precedents:

That a limitation is negative in its nature and may not include positive enactments establishing rules for executive officers.

This amendment certainly would require positive action and provide something for the executive officer to do in the ascertainment of the fact. Furthermore this amendment on its face does not patently appear to be a limitation of expenditures, hence does not fall within the Holman rule. The point of order is sustained.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. FITZGERALD having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 5059. An act granting school lands to the State of Louisiana.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following resolution:

House concurrent resolution 23.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there shall be printed and bound in volume form, with accompanying illustrations, 100,000 copies of the Special Consular Reports on Cotton Tare, submitted by the Department of State in response to the request of Representative WILLIAM G. BRANTLEY, of which 30,000 shall be for the use of the Senate and 65,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 5,000 to be delivered to the House document room for distribution.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purchase, manufacture, and test of ammunition for mountain, field, and siege cannon, including the necessary experiments in connection therewith and the machinery necessary for its manufacture at the arsenals, $600,000.

Mr. RAUCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "dollars," in line 10, page 5, insert the following: "Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the purchase of any ammunition from any person, firm, or corporation which has not at the time of commencement of said work established an eight-hour workday for all employees, laborers, and mechanics engaged or to be engaged in the work of manufacturing the ammunition named herein."

Mr. RAUCH. Mr. Chairman, this amendment limits the purchase of ammunition for mountain, field, and siege cannon to factories which have established an eight-hour workday, and is practically the same as the amendment which I offered yesterday and which was adopted by the committee putting a similar limitation on the Government in the purchase of mountain, field, or siege cannon.

This amendment is in line with the eight-hour law which recently passed the House. It is in line with the recommendations of the President; it is in line with the more advanced methods in the manufacturing world, and I think the amendment should be adopted.

Mr. MANN. I read the amendment which the gentleman offered yesterday. It is impossible to gather from the reading of the amendment in the existing confusion just what it covers. Does the amendment of the gentleman cover the question of the purchase of machinery?

Mr. RAUCH. It does not.

Mr. MANN. Is it the intention of the gentleman to offer a similar amendment to all the paragraphs in this bill?

Mr. RAUCH. Well, I think it logically follows that the amendment should go to the subsequent paragraphs relating to ammunition.

Mr. MANN. If it is the intention to offer a similar amendment to those provisions in the bill to which such an amendment might be applicable; it is a very good illustration of the need of the advisory board which they were discussing before the Committee on the Library this morning, because it would seem almost too absurd for consideration to insert in one bill a few pages along the same language applicable to each paragraph of the bill when the insertion of it in the bill once would be amply sufficient.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, I will say to him it was my intention, if this amendment should be adopted by the committee, to ask unanimous consent to so reform it as to make it apply to all appropriations for ammunition, and thereby avoid the repetition of the limitation on each of the items. I am in accord with the suggestion of the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Now, one other question, if I may ask the gentleman. It has been usual in provisions of this sort to insert "except in time of emergency in case of war." Yet there is no such provision in this amendment. While war is not expected, still the whole theory of the bill is that war may come. We would be rather childish to insert a provision in a bill designed wholly for time of peace when the bill is designed for time of war, which would prevent the operation of the appropriation in time of emergency in case of war.

Mr. RAUCH. I will say to the gentleman I have no objection to that provision being incorporated in the amendment.

Mr. MANN. I hope, if this amendment is to be agreed to—and I assume that it is, because a similar amendment was agreed to by the committee yesterday—it may be re-formed so that there will be only one provision in the bill, and that there is an exception made as to emergency in case of war. Everybody knows that sometimes we have to act very quickly and without the usual restraint.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. RAUCH] consent to adding to his amendment words something like these: "or from any corporation known as a trust." So as to make his proposition squarely within the Democratic platform? Would he accept that as an amendment to his amendment?

Mr. RAUCH. I have no objection to the gentleman offering that amendment.

Mr. GOOD. Well, will the gentleman incorporate it in his amendment, so that when I offer it it will not go out on a point of order?

Mr. RAUCH. I will say frankly to the gentleman that such an amendment will raise questions that are not raised by the amendment that I have offered, and I prefer to have the gentleman offer the amendment himself.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I make a pro forma amendment for the purpose of asking a question. What proportion of powder is now manufactured by the Government?

Mr. SHERLEY. About 25 per cent of all the powder used by the Army and Navy is now manufactured by the Government.

Mr. CANNON. And these amendments are to provide both for the present use and for the reserve, and that there shall be no powder bought that is not manufactured by people who employ labor exceeding eight hours a day?

Mr. SHERLEY. That, I take it, is the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. MANN. It does not cover powder at present.

Mr. CANNON. I take it that it is ammunition. Can the gentleman inform me whether, under this or proposed legislation or limitation, or under existing law, in the event of an emergency the Government could use these appropriations for the purpose of importing ammunition?

Mr. SHERLEY. There is a provision in the bill that permits the purchase abroad, in limited quantities, of supplies provided for in this bill, which would include ammunition, and in point of fact there have been times in the past when a limited amount of powder has been bought abroad.

Mr. CANNON. Is there any proposed legislation to the effect that that powder shall be manufactured by labor that is employed not longer than eight hours a day?

Mr. SHERLEY. I would say to the gentleman that I have not offered this amendment, but I presume that if this amendment limits this appropriation, it would limit it whether the money was spent in this country or outside of this country.

Mr. CANNON. I do not know, because I have not made inquiry, but in the production of ammunition and other material under contract what proportion of the people engaged in the production of that material work under the eight-hour rule?

Mr. SHERLEY. I could not inform the gentleman as to that.

Mr. CANNON. Can the gentleman give the information as to whether, considering the Government as a customer, in the event these various makers of ammunition and other munitions of war would comply with the eight-hour law, it would be for their interest to do so in order to secure the Government as a customer?

Mr. SHERLEY. I suppose that would depend very largely upon the particular facts surrounding each proposed bidder for Government work. I have not the information necessary to enable me to answer.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman know whether such information exists or not?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not. There have been in the past elaborate hearings on the eight-hour law. I was in charge of this bill; this House at this Congress has passed a general eight-hour law applying to all work that the Government may do or have done for itself; and that having been recently enacted by this body, I felt that it expressed the deliberate opinion of this body. Therefore, when the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. RAUCH] offered an amendment in the form of a limitation, which, in my judgment, was not subject to a point of order, I simply made a statement to the House as to the facts which I have just related to the gentleman from Illinois, and the Committee of the Whole yesterday adopted a provision similar to this.

Mr. CANNON. Has the legislation, or the bill which the gentleman refers to as having been passed by the House, been enacted into law?

Mr. SHERLEY. So far as I know, it has not passed the Senate yet.

Mr. CANNON. The object of my inquiry is this: It seems to me that if we are to prohibit the purchase of war material, not only for present use, but for a reserve, unless it is made by eight-hour labor, inasmuch as we buy only 25 per cent of ammunition, for instance, it would be little short of criminal negligence if we do not march up and provide money sufficient to build Government factories so that we could manufacture the material that may be necessary in time of stress and danger.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Goob] has referred to a platform, of which I do not recollect the exact terms, declaring that trust-made goods should not be purchased by the Government. That is one of the declarations in the platform in support of which gentlemen on the other side claim they came into power. Well, I can see that there might be trouble about that, as to finding out what are trust-made articles.

Gentlemen, it is one thing to play politics, but it is another thing to face the situation, and if this legislation is to be enacted—and you are responsible for legislation now—it seems to me that you should take such steps by appropriation and by legislation as will not leave the Government defenseless, and that can only be done by providing the means by which the Government can protect itself by its own factories and by labor employed directly by itself. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment to the amendment.

Mr. RAUCH. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. RAUCH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify the amendment which I offered in accordance with the one which I now send to the Clerk's desk, which I think will meet the objection of the gentleman from Illinois. I ask, Mr. Chairman, to have it read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "dollars" in line 10, page 5, insert the following: "Provided, That except in time of war or when, in the judgment of the President, war is imminent no part of this or of any other sum in this act for ammunition shall be expended for the purchase of any ammunition from any person, firm, or corporation which has not at the time of commencement of said work established an eight-hour day for all employees, laborers, and mechanics engaged or to be engaged in the work of manufacturing the ammunition named herein."

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. RAUCH] asks unanimous consent to modify his former amendment, as indicated by the amendment just reported by the Clerk. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, I send to the Clerk's desk an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman offers an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the amendment the following: "And such purchases shall be by public bid submitted by those offering to sell such materials, which bid shall be accompanied by affidavit of the bidder stating that the bidder is not a member of or a party to any trust, trust agreement, combination, or arrangement with others to restrain trade in or to fix or control prices of said commodities in violation of the laws of the United States or any State of the United States."

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, to that I make a point of order.

Mr. JACKSON. Will the gentleman reserve the point of order?

Mr. SHERLEY. I am willing to reserve it if the gentleman desires to speak to the merits.

Mr. JACKSON. Just a word.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is reserved by the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, my reason for offering this as an amendment to the amendment was in the hope that it might escape any point of order being made to it.

It is a little bit hard to see just why this eight-hour amendment is not subject to a point of order. I understood the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] to admit that eight-hour amendments which have been offered, which involve practically the same conditions, but the others are subject to a point of order and are without the Holman rule.

As I understand the discussion here, the eight-hour amendment is admitted to be not subject to a point of order, at least by the gentleman from Kentucky, because the national platform of the Democratic Party declared for it—

Mr. SHERLEY. I am sure the gentleman does not want to make that reflection upon the gentleman in charge of this bill.

Mr. JACKSON. Oh, no. Let me complete my sentence and the gentleman will see that I do not.

Mr. SHERLEY. It would need completion if it were not to contain a reflection, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. JACKSON. The gentleman interrupted me before I completed the sentence. What I mean to say is this, that the point of order was not made, or the committee agreed to this amendment, which I am in favor of, limiting this appropriation to the expenditure for materials manufactured only under the eight-hour rule, because at least one of the political parties in the country has declared in favor of it, and I hope both parties are in favor of it.

The same party has declared against the purchase of trust-made goods, and I hope both parties are in favor of that proposition.

It seems to me a strange sort of procedure that we sit here day after day devoting the public moneys to legislation against the trusts, instructing the departments of the Government to prosecute the trusts, and then vote millions to buy goods of the trusts.

As has been mentioned here on the floor of the House time after time, the Government of England has recently set us the example of refusing to deal with one of the concerns in our country, forsooth, because we had even charged in our Department of Justice that it constituted a trust. Are we to proceed to vote millions of dollars to purchase materials of a concern which I understand is at this hour being proceeded against by the Department of Justice? I say we ought not to do it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, of course I am in no sense responsible for the ability of one gentleman to draw an amendment within the rules of the House and the inability of another gentleman to draw an amendment so as to be in order under the rules of the House. I did not make a point of order to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. RAUCH], because in my judgment it was not subject to a point of order. I did reserve a point of order to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON], because it clearly is subject to a point of order, and I repeat that I am in no sense responsible for the inability of the gentleman so to present the matter as to come within the rules of the House. Neither am I to be considered as showing any partiality, when my action is necessarily based on the skill of the one gentleman and the lack of skill of the other.

Mr. JACKSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. JACKSON. Will the gentleman please explain to the committee, if this amendment which I have offered is adopted, how any of this appropriation could be used except under the conditions imposed by that amendment?

Mr. SHERLEY. Of course; but that has nothing to do with the question of the point of order. I can not undertake to educate the gentleman at this late day as to the rules and what is a limitation and what is new legislation.

Now, as to prohibiting the purchase of goods from a trust, I am a little bit surprised to find a gentleman belonging to the party in control of the legislative machinery of this Government having so little confidence either in the inclination or the ability of that branch of the Government as to believe that it needs the legislative rather than the executive arm of the Government to interfere with the continued prosperity of the trusts in this country. For myself, I would not be willing at this time to prevent the Government from buying powder from the du Pont powder people, which is the intention of the gentleman as expressed in his amendment, because, whether they be subject to his indictment of being a trust or not, I am not willing to leave the Government in a position where it might not be able at a time when it was necessary to acquire the powder needed for proper defense of the Government. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment of the gentleman is plainly new legislation and not a limitation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. RAUCH].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment. First, I would like to ask the Chair if the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana follows the word "dollars," in line 10, page 5?

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct.

Mr. GOOD. Then my amendment will follow his.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, to follow the amendment just offered by the gentleman from Indiana:

"Provided, That said amount shall be expended in the manufacture of ammunition to the full capacity of Government arsenals before any portion thereof is expended in the purchase of ammunition."

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, to that I reserve a point of order.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that it is clearly a limitation on the expenditure. It will also mean economy in the expenditure of the money that is appropriated. The hearings reveal the fact that it cost the Government a great deal less to manufacture this ammunition than it does to purchase it, and this is a limitation on the appropriation to the extent that only that portion of it can be used in the purchase of the ammunition that can not be manufactured at the arsenal. It requires no determination as to outside conditions to ascertain this fact. The Chief of Ordnance knows what the capacity of the arsenals are. He has stated in his report that the arsenals now have a capacity, running but one shift a day, to manufacture four-fifths of all the powder needed by the War Department. Of course, that estimate does not apply in all respects to ammunition; while we are manufacturing all of our ammunition of a certain class, there are certain kinds of which we are manufacturing only a small portion. It seems to me that this is clearly a limitation, and not new legislation.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman provides that "said amount shall be expended in the manufacture of ammunition to the full capacity of Government arsenals before any portion thereof is expended in the purchase of ammunition."

Now, under existing law, it is for the Ordnance Department to determine what proportion shall be expended in the arsenals and what proportion shall be expended outside. The very purpose of this amendment is to deprive the Ordnance Department of that discretion which it now possesses and to require that it shall exhaust the facilities of the arsenals before it puts any work outside. It is therefore plainly an attempt to change existing law, and, being new legislation, is subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That said amount shall be expended in the manufacture of ammunition to the full capacity of Government arsenals, in all cases where the same can be manufactured more cheaply than it can be purchased, before any portion thereof is expended in the purchase of ammunition.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purchase, manufacture, and test of ammunition for seacoast cannon, including the necessary experiments in connection therewith, and the machinery necessary for its manufacture at the arsenals, $140,000.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That said amount shall be expended in the manufacture of ammunition to the full capacity of Government arsenals, in all cases where the same can be manufactured more cheaply than it can be purchased, before any portion thereof is expended in the purchase of ammunition.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purchase, manufacture, and test of ammunition, subcaliber guns, and other accessories for seacoast artillery practice, including the machinery necessary for their manufacture at the arsenals, $425,000.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That said amount shall be expended in the manufacture of ammunition to the full capacity of Government arsenals, in all cases where the same can be manufactured more cheaply than it can be purchased, before any portion thereof is expended in the purchase of ammunition.

Mr. SHERLEY. I make the point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

That no portion of the said appropriation shall be expended in procuring such ammunition made by any corporation known as a trust or that is a member of any unlawful combination in restraint of trade.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that amendment.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the amendment offered to the provision that provided for the purchase of ammunition and test of mountain, field, and siege cannon, which provided that no portion of the appropriation should be used except that it be for ammunition purchased of concerns that had established an eight-hour day, is not subject to the point of order. No point of order was made against it, and yet it involves the determination by the Chief of Ordnance of an investigation into the question of what factories had employed the eight-hour system.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I could not, from the reading at the desk, judge of the amendment. Since the reading of it I am inclined to think that it is not subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the adoption—

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] desires to see the amendment before the point of order is withdrawn. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa, I am sure, appreciates that, as the Member in charge of this bill, it is my duty to raise questions of order on amendments. I raised the point of order and reserved it in this instance because I was unable from the reading at the desk to ascertain whether it was subject to the point of order or not. I now believe it is not subject to the point of order and therefore I do not make the point of order, but I am opposed to its adoption, and my reasons are these: The purpose and intent of the amendment is to prevent the purchase of powder from the Du Pont Powder Co. or any of its subsidiary companies. Now, it so happens that it is the only company in America prepared to manufacture for the Government the kind of powder it requires, and if we adopt this limitation it means that the Government must manufacture all the powder that it needs, and the Government is not now in a position to manufacture all the powder that it needs. Even if it were in a position to manufacture it all, we, in my judgment, should not manufacture all of the powder. As I stated when the Army bill was up for consideration, there are two good reasons why the Government should not manufacture all of those things necessary to its defense. One is that if it manufactures them entirely it has no means by which it can test the cost of its own manufacture. If, on the other hand, there is some work done by private concerns, there is always a basis upon which you can determine how economically the Government is performing its work. Secondly, we ought not to put this country in a condition where it would be dependent solely upon governmental factories for the supply of ammunition that would be needed in case of war. The powder that is used is of a peculiar kind and quality not used in commercial life. There is no demand outside of the Government demand for its manufacture. If the Government does not, therefore, purchase of outside manufacturers, there is no inducement for those manufacturers to make such powder. We lose the benefit of their skill, of their inventive genius, and of the economies that they may bring about in connection with that manufacture.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky if we have an important reserve now of such powders as are contemplated to be purchased under this paragraph?

Mr. SHERLEY. My recollection is that this paragraph relates to the reserve for seacoast cannon. As to that, we have a reserve of about 70 per cent of what is considered requisite.

Mr. Chairman, it is only fair to say this in connection with the Du Pont people, I have never been either their defender or apologist. It was at my instance that a limitation was put on the price of powder we bought from them. But it is only fair to say that the efficiency of the Government factory, its ability to make powder at the price it does, its skill in making the character of powder it makes, is largely the result of the information and aid that were given to Government officials by the Du Pont powder people. And I believe in giving the devil his due, and though it were four times over a trust, I should present that phase of it to this House.

What is the condition as to powder? We are not paying an extravagant price. I only wish it were possible for the Government to do business at as reasonable a figure in other respects as it is now relative to powder. A limitation was put upon the bill some time ago which confined the price that should be paid for powder other than small-arms powder to 64 cents a pound. At that time we were paying 67½ cents. We are now buying, under contract from the Du Pont people, such powder at 60 cents a pound. The testimony before the committee shows that it costs the Government 55 cents a pound to manufacture, carrying into the computation charges of an overhead nature and interest on money, and so forth.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not believe that the difference between 55 cents that it costs us to make it and the 60 cents that we pay is an unreasonable difference, considering the right of a private concern to earn a reasonable profit on its investment, which profit was not taken into consideration in estimating the cost to the Government of making powder.

Now, as regards small-arms powder, it is costing the Government 65 cents to make it. They were paying, and are now paying, 75 cents; and I placed upon the Army bill this year a limitation that we should not pay exceeding 71 cents for small-arms powder, because I thought the difference between the 65 cents that it costs us to make it and the 75 cents that we were paying was too great a difference, considering that only a difference of 5 cents existed between the Government cost price and the contract price as to powder other than small-arms powder. We do not need any such provision as is offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Goop] in order to protect the Government in this instance, and by adopting it we might put the Government in a situation where in time of great need we would not be able to get the powder necessary to properly protect this country. And I hope the amendment will be defeated.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman, I wish to read just a few sentences from this little red book that I hold in my hand:

The failure of the present Republican administration, with an absolute control over all the branches of the National Government, to enact any legislation designed to prevent or even curtail the absorbing power of the trusts and illegal combinations, or to enforce the antitrust laws on the statute books, proves the insincerity of the high-sounding phrases of the Republican platform.

And again, from the same book:

A private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable. * * * We therefore demand the enactment of such additional legislation as may be necessary to make it impossible for a private monopoly to exist in the United States.

I have read two sections from the Democratic platforms—one from the platform of 1900 and the other from the platform of 1908. While we are appropriating $1,595,000 in this bill for ammunition, every dollar spent in the purchase of ammunition goes into the coffers of what is commonly known as the Powder Trust. We appropriated money a few days ago in the Army bill, a number of millions of dollars, for powder and ammunition, and every dollar appropriated for the purchase of ammunition went into the pockets of what is known as the Powder Trust and the Ammunition Trust. I offered an amendment to limit the expenditure to 10 per cent for the purchase of ammunition. That was rejected by that side of the House. I finally offered an amendment to limit purchases of ammunition to 60 per cent of the appropriation. Notwithstanding the fact that we have now a Government powder factory, with capacity, running at only one shift a day, of producing four-fifths of all the ammunition consumed by the Army—or a capacity, running at full time, to produce more than twice the ammunition that is necessary—gentlemen on that side repudiated their party platform and voted down the amendment.

And Gen. Crozier says that since the establishment of our powder mills by the Government in the Government arsenals we have reduced the price of powder from $1.60 on cannon powder to 60 cents a pound, and he says we are producing better powder now than we ever received by purchase from private manufacturers.

I submit that this resolution ought to be welcomed by the other side of the aisle. You gentlemen over there ought to stand up with one accord if you mean what you say. If you meant what you said when you questioned the sincerity of the Republican Party when it was in power in the House, you should support this amendment. Now that you are in power in this House you should, by your acts, vote according to your party declarations on the trust problem. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I am inclined to think that the amendment already inserted in the bill will prevent the purchase of powder from the Du Pont Co. But whether it will or not I do not know.

I would like to make this suggestion to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Goop] who offered the amendment, that the legislative body ought always to deal fairly with the administrative body. Here is a proposition to say that the administrative body shall determine what is a trust, and shall not make purchases of powder from a trust. It would be fairer, seems to me, if it is the will of Congress that no powder shall be purchased from the Du Pont Powder Co. or any of its subsidiary companies, to say that. And it is quite in order to offer an amendment that no portion of this appropriation shall be expended in the purchase of powder from the Du Pont Co. or any other company which may be named, if Congress chooses to name it. But what will the administrative officers of the Government do with a provision of this kind inserted in the law? Is the Secretary of War—

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. In just a moment. Is the Secretary of War or the Chief of Ordnance to determine whether a company is a trust or not? We are unable to determine it here. The courts, so far, have not determined it. The Attorney General, so far, has not determined it. Have we come to a point where we propose to let the Chief of Ordnance determine what corporations are trusts?

Now, I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GOOD. I would only suggest that the Federal court in the State of Delaware has already determined that about 20 of the powder-producing companies, most of which are subsidiary companies of the Du Pont Co., are unlawful organizations in restraint of trade.

Mr. MANN. Is that a final determination?

Mr. GOOD. I do not know whether the case has been appealed to the Supreme Court or not, but I think it should be sufficient for the guidance of the administrative officer of the Government, to guide him if this amendment should prevail.

Mr. MANN. I do not think so at all. If the court has determined that a trust exists, it is the duty of the court to dissolve the trust. How are you going to leave a question of that sort to be determined by an administrative officer of the Government? If you are going to say that the determination of the court in Delaware is to be a final or official determination, let Congress declare that.

Mr. GOOD. I assumed that the gentlemen on the other side would bring in another bill on the heels of this, defining what a trust is, within the meaning of their platform—that if a concern manufactured more than 50 per cent of a given product it should be deemed to be a trust.

Mr. MANN. My friend from Iowa should remember that there is quite a difference between the responsibility of that side and the responsibility of this side of the House as to legislation. The people, while temporarily entrusting the majority side of the House with legislation, really have no confidence in their legislation, and the bumcombe amendments that are introduced in this body usually come from that side of the House. We can never afford to indulge in them because, after all, we do retain and we intend to retain the confidence of the country for real legislation in the interests of the people and of the country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I do not believe that on the fortifications bill, where the whole country is interested in the proper defense of the country, we ought to indulge in mere partisan efforts to gain advantage before the people at the expense of the defense of the country. We have already agreed to an amendment offered from that side of the House in reference to eight-hour labor, which we all know ought not to be in the law, because much as we may favor the eight-hour proposition we know it has no place in this bill. That has been agreed to; that is in the power of this body to agree to; and if the body here desires to say that no portion of the appropriation shall be expended in the purchase of powder from Du Pont companies, that is taking the responsibility on their shoulders, where it belongs. I do not believe in a legislative body shifting the responsibility, or declaring what is a trust, or from whom purchases shall be made, on to an administrative officer or an administrative bureau, which neither has the time nor the opportunity nor the capacity to determine such a question. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The time to prepare for war is during peace. If the statement made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] is correct I think it is time that this Government, while we are now in profound peace, should look forward to the consequences that will be brought upon this country by the policy that he is now advocating.

He has said that there is no concern from which the Federal Government could secure its powder in case of emergency. Now, think of that proposition for a moment. What is a trust? A trust is an institution that has such control of a commodity that it can fix its own price, without any competition from anybody else. Suppose that a war was declared and the Government had no facilities for buying powder except from this trust, which had the power to command the price that it demanded. What condition would this country be in? My opinion is that if the facts are as stated it is time for the Government to begin now the policy of providing means, either of its own or through independent concerns, by which it can secure its powder in case of a war, without being absolutely and unqualifiedly dependent upon what the gentleman practically concedes to be a trust.

My good friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] suggested that we are throwing upon the department the question of determining whether it is a trust. Not at all. There is now a decision of the court—which, so far as I know, has not been appealed from—which is the law of the land until appealed from and reversed, directing exactly how these men may operate in this matter. It has now been decided what the trust is, and until that decision is reversed, if this amendment is agreed to, the Government can not buy from that organization.

The word "buncombe" has been used here. I am not charging anybody with using buncombe, but I do say that it is a serious and grave problem for a country to confront, when it is admitted by the gentleman in charge of this bill that there is no other place where this Government can get its ammunition, in case of war, except by going to an illegal combination that is in absolute control of the commodity. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa. If it were possible to exterminate the trusts which he is now anxious to prevent selling munitions of war to the Government, I should be very glad to have that done. It may be that within a very brief time there will be an administration that will so conduct the affairs of the Government that there will be no worry about the existence of trusts in this country. But it is useless to shoot at the moonshine. The gentleman from Iowa has not been many years a Member of this House, although he is a very efficient Member. Had he been here longer he would have known more of the history of the attempts to control the du Pont Powder Trust, and he would have realized that his action in attempting to control them has been very rare on that side of the aisle.

In 1906 this side of the House attempted to remedy the situation about which so much complaint was justly made. It attempted in the fortifications act to provide for the establishment of a powder factory for the War Department, but under the operations of the Republican Congress and the application of its rules and its determination that nothing whatever should be done that would interfere with the operation of the Du Pont Powder Co., it was impossible to insert in the fortifications bill an amendment providing for the establishment of what has now become known as the Piccatinny Arsenal, at Dover, N. J.

The controversy was carried to the Senate, and a little later Senator Daniel, of Virginia, offered on the floor of the Senate an amendment to the fortifications bill appropriating $165,000 for the establishment of a powder factory for the War Department. The amendment was adopted and a Republican House was compelled, much against its will, to accept an amendment forced upon it by a Democratic Senator. Whatever good has come from the operation of a Government powder factory is not due to the Republicans, who have until this Congress been in control of the Government in all its branches during 16 years.

Upon the naval appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1910 a Democratic Member of the House, in an attempt to control the activities of the Du Pont Powder Trust, offered an amendment which was finally incorporated into that appropriation act. As finally incorporated it was somewhat different from that proposed in the House. As written in the law the provision was:

No part of any appropriation made in this act for the purchase of powder shall be paid to any trust or combination in restraint of trade, nor to any corporation having monopoly of the manufacture and supply of gunpowder in the United States, except in the event of an extraordinary emergency.

The latter clause was the modification made as a result of the action of the Senate. The next year the department came to Congress and said that it had gone on and purchased powder from the trust as it had theretofore, and the reason it gave was that as it was impossible to obtain the necessary powder in any other place and as the appropriation was for powder essential for the proper conduct of the Government and for the maintenance of that amount of ammunition essential to the proper defense of the Government, it had determined that "an extraordinary emergency" existed and that it was entitled to purchase from the trust.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Since that condition existed, Mr. Chairman, it was realized that it was futile to attempt to prohibit the purchase of powder from the trust. No similar provisions have since been incorporated in the naval appropriation bills.

These munitions of war are essential for the safety of the country, and they must be had, whether manufactured by a trust or manufactured elsewhere.

Unable to prevent the purchase from a trust, Democrats—not Republicans, let me say to the gentleman from Iowa—sought another means to control the operation of the trust, and it was upon the initiative in nearly every instance of the gentleman from Kentucky himself [Mr. SHERLEY] that an amendment was offered to these various bills and enacted into law which placed a restriction upon the price which might be paid for the powder to be purchased from the appropriations made. During all the time in which that was done the gentleman from Kentucky, and those in support of him on this side of the House, had the active and almost united opposition of the Republican majority in the House.

Now, the gentleman from Iowa, with such a record before us, complains that the Democratic Party has not in reporting this appropriation bill incorporated a provision that would be absolutely futile and unavailing to accomplish the purpose which we have long desired and which recently there are indications is desired in some spots on the other side.

It would be futile to enact such a provision, because if it were incorporated in this bill the department would nevertheless be compelled to purchase powder from the Du Pont Powder Co. and report to Congress that it was essential for the public safety to obtain it, and that it could be obtained nowhere else. Unwilling to play politics in an important matter of this kind, I prefer to do what was declared by the Democratic Party at the outset of this Congress to be its policy, to make every appropriation essential for the proper conduct of the Government without attempting to impair or hamper the administration in the conduct of public affairs; and so, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment and hope that it will be voted down. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SMALL). The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Good) there were 6 ayes and 37 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the alteration and maintenance of Seacoast Artillery, including the purchase and manufacture of machinery, tools, materials necessary for the work, and expenses of civilian mechanics and extra-duty pay of enlisted men engaged thereon, $300,000.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment as an independent section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 6, after line 14, add an independent section as follows:

"For the purchase, if a satisfactory price can be agreed upon between the Secretary of War and the owners thereof, and if this can not be done, then for the acquisition by condemnation proceedings, which the Secretary of War is authorized to cause to be instituted, of a sufficient quantity of land at Cape Henry, Va., on which to begin the construction of fortifications at the mouth of Chesapeake Bay, and a sum not exceeding $150,000 is hereby appropriated."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order to that.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. Chairman, I have consumed since I have been a Member of this House so little of its time that I am going to ask unanimous consent to be allowed to discuss this amendment for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. Chairman, in the discussion of this bill yesterday certain statements were made which are calculated, unless corrected, to create erroneous impressions with reference to the fortification of Cape Henry, and to these remarks I feel that it is my duty to make a brief reply.

It was then intimated that the owners of the land at Cape Henry desire the Government to purchase, and at an exorbitant price, more land than is needed for fortification purposes at this point. This intimation does the owners of the land a very great injustice. Unless I have been misinformed, a Government survey has already been made of this land and the quantity of land desired by the Government has already been designated. It is true that no agreement as to price has been reached, but I can say for the owners that, if a satisfactory price can not be agreed on, they are perfectly willing that condemnation proceedings may be instituted for the purpose of ascertaining a fair value for this property. These owners live in my district and I know them well, and I know that they have no disposition whatever to impose on the National Government, but, on the contrary, are willing that the land may be taken for this purpose at even less than its market value. The question, therefore, of the quantity of land to be taken and the price to be paid therefor can not be used as a persuasive argument against this proposition when the offer is thus made on the part of the owners to convey to the Government any quantity of land determined by the Government to be necessary for its purposes, and at a price to be ascertained by disinterested freeholders in regular condemnation proceedings.

It was also stated that our great coast line is not only properly fortified, but in many cases overfortified. This statement is certainly contrary to the opinions expressed by several distinguished Government officials, and is also contrary to the express recommendation of all the Army and Navy experts who have from time to time been appointed to make proper investigations and report what seacoast defenses are actually needed.

Under date of March 5, 1906, President Roosevelt sent to Congress a message, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of War, together with a report of the National Coast Defense Board, upon the coast defenses of the United States. (59th Cong., 1st sess., S. Doc. No. 248.) On page 11 of this report is the following:

Commercially and strategically Chesapeake Bay is to-day, as it always has been, of the very first importance. With the entrance as it is now, unfortified, a hostile fleet, should it gain control at sea, can establish, without coming under the fire of a single gun, a base on its shores, pass in and out at pleasure, have access to a large quantity of valuable supplies of all kinds, and paralyze the great trunk railway lines crossing the head of the bay.

On page 26 of this same report a committee headed by Gen. John P. Story, United States Army, in a report to the Secretary of War, said:

Of the ports above named which are known to be without defenses, those whose protection is urgent are Guantanamo, Subic Bay, and the entrance to Chesapeake Bay. The importance of securing the entrance of the Chesapeake Bay at Cape Henry as an outer line of defense to Baltimore, Washington, Newport News, Norfolk, and the great railroads crossing the Susquehanna River at the head of the bay can not be exaggerated. Any expenditure, however great, is justifiable for the protection of such vast interests.

In President Taft's message to Congress at the beginning of the second session of the Sixty-first Congress there is, under the head of "War Department," the following paragraph:

The coast defenses of the United States proper are generally all that could be desired, and in some respects they are more elaborate than under the present conditions are needed to stop an enemy's fleet from entering the harbors defended. There is, however, one place where additional defense is badly needed, and that is at the mouth of Chesapeake Bay, where it is proposed to make an artificial island which shall prevent an enemy's fleet from entering this, the most important strategic base of operations on the whole Atlantic and Gulf coasts. I hope that appropriate legislation will be adopted to secure the construction of this defense.

Under date of January 11, 1911, Maj. Gen. Leonard Wood, Chief of Staff, United States Army, wrote to me, in part, as follows:

In reply to your letter of January 9 relative to an appropriation for the fortification of the entrance to the Chesapeake Bay, I have only to inform you that the fortification of that entrance is regarded by this department as a matter of military necessity.

These are the statements and recommendations of our highest officials and best Army and Navy experts. So far as I know, not one of them lives in the district in which these defenses are to be constructed, and hence they can have no local bias or interest in the proposition. They have made this recommendation as disinterested and patriotic Americans deeply concerned in all vital matters of national defense, and have thereby declared that this is no longer a local question but one of national importance.

The report of the National Coast Defense Board has formed the guide from which it has heretofore been determined what points along our coast line should be, as a matter of national defense, properly fortified and protected. If this report is a proper guide as to the scheme of fortifications adopted at other points—and it has always been so considered—and if most of the plans and projects recommended in it have already been favorably passed on by this House, is there any good reason why this report can not now be safely followed as to fortifications at the mouth of the Chesapeake Bay?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

Mr. HOLLAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman know what this land is worth?

Mr. HOLLAND. I am perfectly willing, Mr. Chairman, that its value shall be determined by condemnation proceedings and fixed by disinterested freeholders.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am glad to know that, but I asked the gentleman if he knew what the land was worth.

Mr. HOLLAND. I will say frankly to the gentleman that I can not give him an estimate of the value.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman know how much land will be needed?

Mr. HOLLAND. A Government survey has been made, I can state, but whether or not all the land included in that survey will be necessary or not I can not say.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman know what armament is proposed to be put there, and what garrisons?

Mr. HOLLAND. That is a matter to be hereafter determined by the Congress.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman think Congress is warranted in going ahead and making an appropriation now of $150,000 without knowing the value of the land, the amount necessary, the armament that should be placed there, or the cost of the scheme when completed?

Mr. HOLLAND. Yes; I can say in reply to my friend, I do; and I do for this reason: Because I believe that I can trust to the Congress of the United States to show the judgment which may be necessary in providing for fortifications of this character.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HOLLAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. GOOD. I understood the gentleman to say that a survey has been made by the Government. What did that survey show?

Mr. HOLLAND. Something like 300 acres, as I understand it.

The mouth of the Chesapeake Bay once entered would give an enemy easy access to the National Capital. No well-informed naval officer doubts that, under cover of darkness or during hazy or misty weather, the ships of a foreign nation can easily pass Cape Henry, safe from the marksmanship of our splendid gunners at Fortress Monroe, more than 12 miles away. And once past Cape Henry these ships can steam up Chesapeake Bay without going within the range of a single gun. "With this entrance as it is now, unfortified, a hostile fleet, should it gain control at sea," says the report of the National Coast Defense Board, "can establish, without coming under the fire of a single gun, a base on its shores."

And only a few days ago another Army officer, Gen. Crozier, Chief of Ordnance, made the following statement:

I think that Washington could be captured within a month if any power or combination of powers, which had command of the sea, should think it worth while to try it. I think that the mouth of the Chesapeake Bay ought to be closed, if it can be done with any reasonable expense, because it is a large body of sheltered water and it would afford a resting place for the same kind of operation that was successful in 1814. I do not see why, if one or two powers of Europe should conceive that they had occasion to make a bold stroke against us, there would be anything impracticable in their capturing this Capital again.

Gen. Crozier at the same time made this further strong statement:

Assuming they had control of the sea, a hundred thousand troops could do it, with a large margin to spare. A hundred thousand troops could be gotten over here and into Chesapeake Bay and be landed at Annapolis, or upon the same river they landed before, the Patuxent, the mouth of which is not fortified, and by which they could land within a short distance of Washington and march overland.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JONES. I ask that the gentleman may be granted five minutes additional.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman may have five minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOLLAND. If Gen. Crozier is right in his conclusion that Washington can be thus captured within a month by a foreign power or combination of powers, then it also follows that the cities of Baltimore and Philadelphia, as well as Annapolis, and the Naval Academy located at that point, can as easily be captured. It also follows that the cities of Norfolk and Portsmouth, Newport News and Richmond, along with the well-equipped Government naval station at Portsmouth, the extensive shipbuilding plant at Newport News, and the great coal piers on Hampton Roads, representing millions of dollars in value, can also be taken by a foreign foe. The fact is at no other point on our great coast line is presented in the hands of an enemy such an opportunity for the capture and destruction of vast property interests. "Any expenditure, however great," says the report of the National Coast Defense Board, on page 26 of that report, "is justifiable for the protection of such vast interests."

In pursuance of the plans and projects recommended in that report estimates are annually submitted by the Secretary of War of the sums needed to carry on the work. In his last annual report, Gen. W. H. Bixby, Chief of Engineers of the Army, made the following recommendation:

With the view to beginning the construction of defenses for the entrance to the Chesapeake Bay, an estimate of $150,000 is submitted, to be applied to the acquisition of land at Cape Henry.

The estimates so made, according to usual custom, constitute the bill as submitted by the committee. But in this case this estimate for some reason has been eliminated. Can the reason have been a sound one?

It seems to have been eliminated, first, because it is not believed that this, the most important strategic and yet most vulnerable point on the entire Atlantic and Gulf coasts, is in danger, unless an enemy should gain control at sea. If this argument is sound, then it follows that the millions of dollars already expended for great coast defenses near the great city of New York and at other important and vulnerable points along our great coast line have been unwisely expended. The fact is, such an argument could be made against all coast defenses and, if followed, would leave our entire coast line unprotected, save by our battleships. I do not believe this is a wise national policy. It is certainly against the advice of the National Coast Defense Board, by whose recommendations we have heretofore been guided in matters of this kind and by whose recommendations we can still safely be guided.

It seems to have been eliminated, secondly, because an effort is being made to establish a record for economy, and to make appropriations for only such projects as have already been undertaken, and must, therefore, be maintained. My contention is that this appropriation can not be denied on this ground. With these fortifications at Cape Henry fewer battleships will be required to defend these vast interests, and, in the event of war, a larger number of ships can profitably be used for the defense of other points along the Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts. Several of our greatest ports lie almost within gunshot of the ocean, and, in time of war, would require, in addition to their present defenses, all the protection that they could get from the great battleships of our Navy. The great Pacific coast, with its present inadequate defenses, most assuredly needs for its better protection a much larger number of battleships than can now safely be withdrawn from the Atlantic division. When the great Panama Canal is opened, this great American project, along with the Government's other vast interests over the seas, will need the protection of a much larger number of battleships than now belong to the American Navy. The refusal, therefore, to fortify Cape Henry will make more necessary, in order to properly guard and defend the great interests of the Government, a much larger increase in the size, strength, and effectiveness of our Navy than is now anticipated—an expense which can partially be saved by the construction of the necessary defenses at that point.

But even in order to establish a record for economy, I do not believe the policy advocated by the committee is a wise one or should be followed. I believe in economy, but I also believe that economy, when unwisely practiced, is almost criminal. I believe that the affairs of the Government should be economically administered, but I do not desire to establish a record for economy at the possible risk of the Nation's capital or at the possible sacrifice of the Nation's interests. The American people have condemned, and will continue to condemn, needless extravagance on the part of its representatives, but they have justified, and will continue to justify, all proper expenditures deemed necessary for the Nation's defense or for the protection of the Nation's property.

I do not believe there is any present probability of war. The likelihood of any nation landing a force for the invasion of this country is remote. The National Capital and the vast interests about which I have spoken are doubtless safe from capture by a foreign power or combination of powers at any time within the near future. But in time of peace, and when war is not anticipated, the Nation's money can safely and wisely be appropriated for matters of national defense.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I have but very little time, and if the gentleman will give me five minutes more I will.

Mr. SHERLEY. I will give the gentleman whatever time he wants, as far as I can, but I would like to ask the gentleman if he can state for the information of the committee the various forms through which this project has gone from the time it started out as a floating battery and ended with an artificial island and then with two forts up to the time when it now reaches the indefinite proposition of buying land for one fort.

Mr. HOLLAND. I have not been in Congress as long as my friend from Kentucky, and I am unable to give him all the information he may desire with regard to this matter; nor have I been a member of the Committee on Appropriations, and hence I am not entirely familiar with the information which my friend seems to possess.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask that my colleague be permitted to proceed for five minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks that his colleague may be permitted to proceed for five minutes longer. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHARP. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question purely for information?

Mr. HOLLAND. If the gentleman does not take up too much of my time.

Mr. SHARP. Does the gentleman know whether, in any other previous bills appropriating money for fortifications, estimates have been made at all upon this project?

Mr. HOLLAND. I understand estimates have been made, but just exactly what those estimates were I am unable to say.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. HOLLAND. I will ask my friend to excuse me, as I have only a few minutes' time.

The unprotected entrance at the mouth of the Chesapeake Bay is now an open invitation to an invasion by any nation with whom we might be at war, and the time has come when that invitation should be withdrawn. The entrance from the ocean into Chesapeake Bay and into Hampton Roads lies between Cape Henry and Cape Charles. The main ship channel lies on the Cape Henry side, and this channel must be followed by all great battleships coming into the Capes from the ocean. Cape Henry is therefore so situated that, with our present long-range guns, it can be so well fortified as to make it impassable and impregnable. This fact was practically admitted on yesterday by my friend Mr. SHERLEY, the chairman of the subcommittee, when, after stating that the recommendation to build an artificial island at the Capes had been abandoned, he further said that "the range of guns has so increased and the draft of vessels has so increased, which therefore narrows the channel that they could use, as to make it possible, in the view of Army officers, to fortify the two shores so as to close that entrance." And until it is so closed the most important strategical base of operations along the whole Atlantic and Gulf coasts will not be properly protected.

I have, for these reasons, offered this amendment providing for an appropriation of a sum not exceeding $150,000 for the acquisition of land at Cape Henry on which to begin the construction of such defenses. A scheme of fortification at Cape Henry has been strongly recommended by the National Coast Defense Board. The appropriation of $150,000 for that purpose has been recommended by Gen. Bixby, Chief of Army Engineers, and I hope this House, relying on these recommendations, will adopt this amendment.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, Napoleon, when asked during his campaign in Russia, "What is war?" replied, "The trade of barbarians, the whole art of which consists of being strongest on a given point." The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HOLLAND] has introduced an amendment to the fortification bill providing for the appropriation of $150,000 for the purchase or condemnation of such land as may be necessary at Cape Henry, in Virginia, in order that the same may be used to fortify the other side of the mouth of the Chesapeake Bay. If there is any one place on the Atlantic seaboard which should be made impregnable it certainly seems to me it is the entrance to the Chesapeake Bay between Cape Charles and Cape Henry, and I would not inject myself into this discussion nor burden the House with the remarks I am about to make were it not for the fact that I see the great necessity for proper fortifications at this point.

Chesapeake Bay is one of finest inland waterways in the world. From it proceeds those great rivers—the Susquehanna, the Patapsco, the Severn, the Patuxent, and the Potomac. On the Patapsco lies the great city of Baltimore, the gateway to and the metropolis of the South. Through this city passes the great railroads which carry the goods of the South to the North, and those of the North to the South, and convey passengers to and from those sections of our country. It is, I might say, the small end of the funnel, all the immense wealth of the South pouring into the large end of the funnel and passing into or through the city of Baltimore—figuratively speaking, the small end—to the North beyond. Its shipping and its commerce are vast; its trade and its manufactures are immense. On the Severn lies the historic city of Annapolis, the capital of the State of Maryland, the place where Washington resigned his commission as Commander in Chief of the American Army, and the location of the new Naval Academy of our country, where millions of dollars have been spent in the erection of magnificent buildings and the equipment of a naval institution worthy of a great Nation.

On the Potomac lies Washington, the Capital of the country, with its beautiful buildings, its wide avenues, its vast collection of Government archives and treasures, and all the necessities and machinery for the Government of this great United States. And then near the mouth of the bay we have the prosperous and splendid cities of Norfolk and Newport News with their shipping, their business and their wealth, and at Newport News the large shipyards that have constructed so many battle-ships of the American Navy.

I might mention several smaller rivers that lead from this bay upon which are cities smaller in size, but of wonderful resources. To neglect, therefore, to protect by fortifications at Cape Henry the vast wealth represented by these cities and this section of our country would be, indeed, a great mistake.

If we had the time it might be well to glance into history, and particularly into the history of the War of 1812, between this country and Great Britain, and consider well the lessons it taught. When we recall the landing of the British in 1814 at Benedict, on the Patuxent River, their marching with little opposition to Bladensburg, the retreat of the unskilled but patriotic American militia, and the capture and burning of Washington by Gen. Ross and his forces, that recollection should be sufficient to guard us against any negligence as to fortification for time immemorial. When those forces, after destroying the city of Washington with its public buildings, arrived at the city of Baltimore, they found the forces at Fort McHenry awaiting them, and the volleys which they poured into the British ships soon compelled them to withdraw; and there and then was born our national anthem, The Star-Spangled Banner, written by Francis Scott Key while imprisoned on a British ship. When the land forces arrived at the city of Baltimore they, too, were met by American troops, and Gen. Ross himself was killed by two Baltimore boys—Wells and McComas. His death disorganized the British troops and had as much to do with the repulse of the expedition as any other one cause. And to-day there arises in the city of Baltimore a modest but interesting monument bearing the names of Wells and McComas, those two patriotic youths.

The repulsion of the British at Baltimore—the city they were so desirous of capturing, because it was the home port of the numerous ships which roved the seas and did such telling damage to English shipping—was the conclusion of an invasion which brought home to our forefathers the need for proper fortification. And so I say, Mr. Chairman, while I do not believe such an occurrence possible of repetition, I believe at the same time it is highly important in time of peace to protect this country and its people by every necessary fortification from the incursion of an enemy from any point.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] contends that the owners of the land are asking too much for the land. In answer to that I will say that this amendment provides for the condemnation, if necessary, of the land; and whether or not the price is high or low, if it is necessary for the proper fortification and proper protection, it would be well for this country to have it at any cost.

The Coast Defense Board has recommended that this land be purchased and that proper fortifications be erected, and I believe that every Member on the floor of this House recognizes the importance of the fortifications at the mouth of the Chesapeake Bay, and I sincerely hope, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I desire to add my voice in support of this amendment. We are not given to consider as carefully as we might the commercial importance of this part of the Atlantic seaboard. I presume, if the statistics could be brought into the House at this time, they would show that the commerce passing around about Capes Henry and Charles, and running up as far as Cape Henlopen, would exceed, perhaps 10 times, the volume of commerce it is anticipated will pass through the Panama Canal the first year of its operation. Norfolk and vicinity are constantly increasing as export and import points. The country is developing in that direction, and its inland waterways are constantly adding new business. But the Chesapeake Bay approaches are not only to Hampton Roads and Norfolk and vicinity, but they extend on up to Baltimore and through canals that now exist, and which we hope some day will be improved, to Philadelphia and New York, and ultimately to Boston. And by the same token they extend south, and provision, I understand, will shortly be made by this Congress for the improvement of an inside waterway south of Norfolk, which will lead on into the North Carolina sounds and out into the Atlantic Ocean below Cape Hatteras. There ought to be a better system of defenses at the mouth of the Chesapeake Bay than we have to-day. It is perhaps the most exposed point along the entire Atlantic coast. Narragansett Bay is frequently spoken of as a point at which we may some day mobilize the naval forces of the country on the Atlantic seaboard. It is a well protected bay, but there is no finer body of water in the United States, nor a body of water which is now attracting more attention on the part of naval men and commercial men than Chesapeake Bay. It is a more exposed bay than any along the Atlantic coast for a stretch of fully 1,800 miles, and it seems to me that we ought to look a little bit into the future with regard to the protection of so important a point along our seaboard.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman have any fear that these remarkable warships will take Philadelphia through one of those canals?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Not at all; but I would like to protect the commerce that comes from the South to Philadelphia through the inside waterways to-day.

I have stood on Fortress Monroe with officers of the Navy Department. I stood there with the commander of the Atlantic Squadron not more than two months ago, and I heard the observation passed by him and by others with regard to the need of additional defenses. There is an expanse of water there perhaps 12 miles wide from the fort to Cape Henry.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman mean to tell this committee that that part of the Chesapeake which is supposed to be protected by Fortress Monroe is not adequately protected?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It was stated on this last visit of mine to Fortress Monroe that we were not adequately protected, and that in the event of darkness or possibly fog it would be easy for an enemy to go into Chesapeake Bay and begin the bombardment of Norfolk.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman means that part of the Bay that is supposed to be protected by Fortress Monroe, I beg leave to say to him that this is the first time that I have ever heard it intimated by anybody, layman or otherwise, that there are not ample fortifications there.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. At Fortress Monroe?

Mr. SHERLEY. We have been spending a lot of money uselessly there if those fortifications are not ample.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have not raised that question at all. I had reference to the other side of the water toward Cape Henry. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia proposed to fortify the Cape Henry side. I have raised no question as to the sufficiency of the fortifications at Fortress Monroe, but I do raise the question, as the gentleman from Virginia does, with regard to the nonprotected coast on the Cape Henry side.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman believe it would be possible to attack Norfolk from the sea without first subduing the forts now in the Chesapeake?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. All I have to say in reply to that is that I have heard naval men say so.

Mr. SHERLEY. I have never heard of their saying so.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Vessels could make their way up there in the dark, and it seems to me we should guard against it.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM]?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. HELM. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania know the opinion of Gen. Wood as to the efficiency of Fort Monroe?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Oh, he is an Army man. I am speaking of naval men. The conversation I had was with naval men. I would be very glad, however, to have Gen. Wood's view.

Mr. HELM. This question was asked Gen. Wood in the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department:

The CHAIRMAN. How does Fort Monroe compare with the other coast-defense posts?

Gen. Wood. It is a first-class work, and up to the range of its guns it is thoroughly efficient in every way. It is an excellent, well-equipped fortress.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is, up to the "efficiency of its guns." Now, I would not undertake to set my judgment up against that of Gen. Wood in a matter of this kind, but the "efficiency of its guns" leaves me out. What we need is fortification beyond "the present efficiency" of those guns, because the present fortifications do not protect the entire approaches to the bay and to Hampton Roads.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended one minute. I desire to ask him another question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] be extended one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HELM. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania how wide is that roadway?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think it is about 12 miles from Fort Monroe to Cape Henry.

Mr. HELM. That is not in Hampton Roads?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am speaking of the distance across from Fort Monroe to Cape Henry.

Mr. HELM. That is not where Fort Monroe is located?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I say that the guns at Fort Monroe are not sufficient to reach all the approaches to Hampton Roads. I have seen the guns tried myself.

Mr. HELM. The gentleman was speaking a moment ago about the protection of Norfolk, and my colleague [Mr. SHERLEY] stated that the guns at Fort Monroe were ample to protect the city of Norfolk. From the gentleman's statement I understand that he was standing on the fort with a naval officer when the officer expressed the opinion that Fort Monroe was not a sufficient guard or protection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes. Not only was it so stated, but it was apparent from the ocular demonstration we had in seeing the shells fall; and they did not pretend that the shells could go across the expanse of water between the fort and the capes, and I doubt if they can, although it is true that we have large disappearing guns that rise and fall at that fort.

Mr. HELM. Does the gentleman take the position that a man-of-war, a Dreadnought, could pass Fort Monroe and get to Norfolk without discovery?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think one could in the dark, and in the fog, and under other certain circumstances.

Mr. KONIG. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to consume more than a minute of the valuable time of this House, but I construed the remark of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], the chairman of the committee, yesterday as meaning that he would be in favor of beginning the construction of a fort at Cape Henry, providing that certain interests were not trying to hold the Government up, trying to get an excessive price for some land beyond what it was really worth.

I have been informed that the gentleman from Kentucky is a very excellent and able lawyer, and I know, as a plain layman, that nobody can hold up the United States Congress, because, in my judgment, it holds it in its power to institute any condemnation proceedings that it wishes to put into effect through executive officers.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the history of the proposed fortification of the lower Chesapeake is illuminating; and if ever there was an instance where Congress has been warranted by events in the pursuit of a conservative course touching fortifications, it has been in regard to the Chesapeake. Those of the membership of the House who are familiar with the report of the Endicott Board will recall that that report contemplated the placing of floating batteries in the middle of the mouth of the Chesapeake in order to protect it. That was the original scheme that Congress was asked to adopt. No one to-day would seriously contend for its adoption now.

That was followed by a program to build an artificial island in the middle of the Chesapeake, though the proposal was not accompanied with any knowledge as to the depth of water, or had there been any borings to show the depth to which it would be necessary to go before a firm foundation would be reached, or what the real cost might be. The committee were unanimous in rejecting that proposal.

Then it was suggested that we fortify the mouth of the Chesapeake by fortifications on the two shores, and now it is suggested that we fortify it by guns and mortars simply at Cape Henry.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I should like to ask when it was that the artificial island was recommended?

Mr. SHERLEY. Within less than four years. I have been a member of the Committee on Appropriations for five years, and I recall that during that time the matter was brought before the committee and seriously urged, just as it was urged that we should build an artificial island in Manila Bay.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Is the gentleman aware that Fort Carroll, near Baltimore, was abandoned some 30 years ago because an artificial island was found not to be satisfactory for that purpose?

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, I beg to assure the gentleman that the abandonment of a particular plan because it is unsuited does not estop the Army at any future time from recommending the same thing as being highly desirable. In point of fact, we have had this very great change of program, and to-day there is no detailed information in the possession of the committee, nor was there in the possession of the officer who presented the item, as to the amount of land that would be required there or the character of the fortifications. I have from other sources information as to the probable armament that would be put at Cape Henry, but the committee do not feel warranted at this time in recommending an appropriation of $150,000 for the purchase of land the value of which we know but little about, and the quantity necessary we know even less about.

Now, I have had the Secretary of War prepare for me a statement showing the amount of acreage owned by the Government of the United States at the various seacoast forts and the amount of that acreage that it is probably unnecessary to own. It shows that something like 8,000 acres of land could be disposed of by the Government as being unnecessary. As I stated yesterday, I for one am unwilling to meet a proposition so generally stated as this with an affirmative vote appropriating $150,000 to buy land when we now have 8,000 acres of land that ought to be disposed of. We never have presented to us by the War Department a proposition to sell along with a proposition to buy, but it is always a continual asking that we buy additional land without any disposition to relieve the Government of the burden of land and of fortifications no longer necessary.

Mr. HOLLAND. Is it not a fact that the Government owns no land at Cape Henry?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly it is, or you would not be here asking us to buy it.

Mr. HOLLAND. Is it not a fact also that what it owns at other points should not interfere with the purchase by the Government of land at Cape Henry?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes and no. This is true: That the proposition, if it has merit, ought to stand on its own bottom, and I am frank to say that I believe the time is approaching when the War Department will present such a detailed reasonable plan as to appeal to the judgment of the committee and of Congress.

[The time of Mr. SHERLEY having expired, by unanimous consent he was given five minutes more.]

But when we have had such extravagant plans presented as this, presented without any detailed information, I do not believe that this Congress ought to be swept off its feet by the talk we have every year of the danger of Washington being sacked and burned by a foreign foe, landed on the shores of Virginia and marching from there to the Capital. Why, if this fright keeps on—and it has extended now to Philadelphia, which is rather notable for its timidity—if it ever reaches New England the Lord knows what will happen, for they were in a panic during the Spanish War. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARLIN. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. CARLIN. Has the War Department recommended this scheme?

Mr. SHERLEY. In general terms, that $150,000 be appropriated for the purchase of land there. But they do not carry with this recommendation the detailed information as to the value of the land, the amount of the land that is needed, or the cost of the whole project, or any of the other things that the committee is entitled to know before it is asked to appropriate this sum.

Accordingly, in view of the fact that it has been only a year or two since they told us it was useless to undertake the defense of the mouth of the Chesapeake by batteries on shore—that unless we built the artificial island it was unavailing—is the committee to blame if it insists on going slow in this matter and asking for more information?

Mr. CARLIN. The committee has been in session three months. Has it not had time to get that information?

Mr. SHERLEY. The committee has had the time to get it if it was available, but the men who were supposed to have the information, when interrogated about it, did not have it. The statement was made by Col. Burr that the information was in the possession of the Norfolk officer, and he could only state that it had been transmitted here, and he presented it here without any personal knowledge concerning the matter.

Mr. CARLIN. The information is in existence?

Mr. SHERLEY. I presume so; but I say I do not think there is such a need for the fortification that the committee would be warranted in going ahead without it. If the War Department is not able to furnish detailed information to the committee, we are not to be censured because we have not gone out ourselves and procured it.

Mr. CARLIN. I am not censuring the gentleman or the committee; I am simply asking if the information is not in existence and obtainable.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not know; I know the statement was made by Col. Burr that he did not have it; that the information came from the officer at Norfolk, and he presumably did have it. But it has never been furnished to the committee, and it has never been thought advisable for the committee to send for district officers to determine whether they should enter into a project of this kind or not.

In my judgment, we are going to reach a time when they will have presented an item sufficiently modest in amount and accurate in detail to justify Congress in doing something toward the fortification of the lower Chesapeake; not because I believe there is any danger of an army ever being landed on those shores. I do not. Speaking for myself, I believe that the fears that these Army officers express, and gentlemen on this floor have expressed, are without any reasonable basis. I do not expect ever to see the time when there is any probability of that being realized; but because I recognize that men having a technical training and skill are better qualified to judge than I am, even though their zeal for their profession sometimes biases their judgment, I am unwilling to stand on my personal views; but I am not willing at this time, without information, to have Congress appropriate this sum of money for this purpose.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the amendment does not direct the purchase of the land, but simply leaves it with the War Department to negotiate for the land if, in its judgment, it ought to be purchased.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, the gentleman is too old a legislator, and I think I am, to be willing to submit a proposition in that loose way on the theory that the department may not spend the money. If you appropriate $150,000 for the purchase, $150,000 will most likely be spent for the purchase of the land.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The basis of the recommendation of the department is that $150,000 should be appropriated for the purpose, and this amendment merely carries out the recommendation.

Mr. SHERLEY. A recommendation unaccompanied by any information.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not understand that the gentleman from Kentucky disputes the wisdom of placing fortifications on Cape Henry.

Mr. SHERLEY. I say, personally, I dispute it. I am not and never have been impressed with the idea; but I am not willing to put my opinion against men of more skill and learning in matters of this kind.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, it is just six years since the scheme of providing these defenses at the entrance of Chesapeake Bay was broached. It was initiated in the report of the so-called Taft Board, which made a report supplementing the scheme of fortifications for the United States prepared by the Endicott Board in 1886. I have been a member of the Subcommittee on Fortifications ever since this matter was first proposed, and I came to the conclusion several years ago that the scheme was absolutely unnecessary and indefensible. The testimony before the committee is to the effect that every important place within the Capes is impreguably fortified and that these defenses are needed for an entirely different purpose than that stated by the gentlemen urging this amendment. Several years ago I went down to the mouth of the Chesapeake with a number of distinguished officers who desired to show to the committee just where they wished to establish these defenses and to point out their necessity. Among those in the party were practically the entire General Staff. Coming back there was a discussion as to the necessity of the proposed defenses. One of the most distinguished officers in the War Department at that time undertook to establish the necessity for them. I hope the committee will listen carefully to this statement, because upon it is predicated the recommendation of the department. It determined for me that the expenditure was wholly unwarranted. The proposition is that, in the event of a coalition between Germany and Great Britain against the United States, they would probably seize Cuba and would establish there a base of operations. They would then sweep the American Navy from the seas, and, with Cuba as a base of operation, they could enter the Chesapeake Bay without coming in range of the guns of any fortifications and could convey within Chesapeake Bay about 100,000 men, land them in this country, and be prepared to move in an offensive manner against the point they would select. I said to this officer, "It took Great Britain three years to put 100,000 men into South Africa, a country that did not have a rowboat and was insignificant in every sense in comparison with the United States."

I do not know how long it would take Great Britain and Germany to transport these 100,000 men to Cuba and to transport them then to the United States, but what do you imagine would happen to 100,000 foreign troops landed on the soil of the United States within the capes of Chesapeake Bay? "Well," he said, "the British army took Washington and burned it during the War of 1812." I said, "Yes; and very little mention is made of the manner in which the American Army acted during that campaign, and the less said about it the more thankful American citizens are." This proposition originally, and I do not know whether it has been modified, I understand it has, contemplated the construction of an artificial island in the mouth of the Chesapeake between the capes, which at first was roughly estimated to cost $4,000,000. At that time the present Chief Executive was Secretary of War. He appeared before the committee in support of the project. No borings had ever been made, no surveys had ever been made, nobody knew whether it was quicksand or rock or mud at the place where it was desired to construct the artificial island. It was intended to be placed on a shoal in 17 or 18 feet of water. The committee very properly and wisely declined to enter upon any such scheme, and yet the present Chief Executive was so enamored of it, and gentlemen seem to have overlooked this fact, that he once sent a special message to Congress urging that an appropriation be made to construct this artificial island. It later developed that instead of costing $4,000,000 it would cost at least $10,000,000. My recollection has brought back some incidents in connection with this enterprise, and I have looked up the testimony.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask that my time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In 1908 there was a hearing on this question, and this island was under discussion, and I inquired of Col. Abbot:

Have you any estimate of what those sites will cost?

Col. ABBOT. $2,600,000 is the estimated cost of the artificial island; and we must make a purchase of land at Cape Henry, for which we will have to have practically a half million dollars.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is that where they want $4,000 an acre?

Col. ABBOT. They put in a bill at the last Congress ordering the purchase of two square miles for $500,000.

Mr. SMITH. Was that for both Cape Henry and Cape Charles?

Col. ABBOT. Cape Henry alone.

Gen. MACKENZIE. Cape Charles was $30,000.

Col. ABBOT. That is for a small island right off Cape Charles.

Mr. GILLET. Then it would be something over $3,000,000 for the sites.

Mr. SMITH. And that would make a total of $9,232,871. If we were to start part of this work, it would be of very little value unless completed in accordance with the plans of the Taft Board?

Col. ABBOT. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH. What would be the effect of long-range batteries mounted on Capes Henry and Charles without the artificial island?

Col. ABBOT. It would not prevent anything from coming in.

Mr. SMITH. So that you would regard any construction of batteries on Cape Henry or Cape Charles as worthless unless Congress appropriated the money to carry out this island project?

Col. ABBOT. I do, sir, unquestionably.

So that the purchase of this land, the price of which has gradually decreased from something in the neighborhood of $4,000 an acre to, this year, $500 an acre, does not mean merely the erection of guns at Cape Henry, but it means entering upon a project that will cost at the very least $10,000,000. The testimony from which I have read was given less than four years ago. The erection of these defenses to keep out a fleet which may come, in the event of a coalition between two great powers like Germany and Great Britain, against the United States, provided they should first occupy Cuba as a base of operation, was too much even for my youthful innocence at that time.

Mr. HOLLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will.

Mr. HOLLAND. The gentleman knows the amendment proposed provides for the acquisition of this land by condemnation proceedings, so far as it can be agreed upon?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes, I do; and I have practiced law, and have practiced largely in condemnation proceedings—

Mr. HOLLAND. The gentleman stated a few minutes ago—

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me make this statement first. I know that a government, either Federal, State, or municipal, even in condemnation proceedings, never gets land within a reasonable reach of its true value.

Mr. HOLLAND. The gentleman stated a few minutes ago it had been estimated that these fortifications would cost something like $10,000,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I did.

Mr. HOLLAND. Where did you get that information?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I got that information from the hearings before the Committee on Appropriations. That includes the artificial island which is part of the Taft Board scheme, and it was stated that the doing of any part of it would be of practically no value unless the entire scheme was carried out.

Mr. HOLLAND. Is not the gentleman aware that this plan for a floating island has been abandoned?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand the department has now come to the point where it believes that an artificial island is not necessary, and it is my opinion that if we wait a little longer it will catch up with me altogether and come to the conclusion that this wild dream of a coalition between Germany and Great Britain, by which Cuba will be seized as a base of operations and a futile, ridiculous, preposterous attempt made to land 100,000 troops in the United States inside of the capes at the entrance to the mouth of the Chesapeake, will never be realized and should be abandoned even by the wildest dreamer who sleeps in dread of the possibility of war between the United States and some foreign power.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Even admitting there is some basis for the gentleman's picture of the dream and its impossibilities, have we not got down now to a concrete proposition?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; we have had this proposition—

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania (continuing). And taking a start toward fortifying the other side of Hampton Roads as it ought to be?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is not the other side; it is the same side.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Cape Charles is on one side, and Cape Henry is upon the other side; and the idea here is to start fortifications on the other side and command both sides of the entrance.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] has posed here as a great military strategist.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I never served in that capacity.

Mr. FITZGERALD (continuing). And he makes the same statement as many other gentlemen in urging this matter. He talks about a foreign fleet coming into Chesapeake Bay in a fog or on a very dark night in case of war. Now, he is too much of a mariner, if he would stop to think a minute, ever to believe that any foreign fleet will attempt to enter the Chesapeake Bay on a foggy night or in the dark.

Now, Mr. Chairman, just one word as to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will ask the gentleman this question: If it is not a fact that at Boston both sides of the entrance are fortified, and at New York, which is perhaps as weak a point as any along the coast?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is mistaken about New York and about other places. I have inquired about the probabilities, in the event of war, of New York being reduced by a hostile fleet, and I was told by the Chief of Artillery that the defenses of New York Harbor, in about one-half hour, would blow out of the water any fleet that might be brought within range of them.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Before they got in sight?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is immaterial whether they were in sight or out of sight.

No foreign fleet will attempt to enter Chesapeake Bay merely for the purpose of resting there and to permit the officers and crews to recuperate; and every point within the Capes, according to the testimony, is impreguably fortified.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I only want the gentleman to consider as fairly the approaches to the Chesapeake Bay as he would consider those other great seaports along the Atlantic coast and along the Pacific coast. I am confident that if the gentleman looks into it that he will find that in most cases both sides of the entrances are amply fortified.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, in order to have adequate fortifications it is not necessary to have guns on both sides of the entrance.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If you can reach across the intervening expanse with your guns or gunfire, that would be so, but here in this case the distance is so great that you can not reach across.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There are a number of places on the Atlantic coast and on the Pacific coast into which foreign fleets can go, and yet it has never been suggested that those places should be defended. Foreign fleets do not enter harbors for the purpose of anchoring or for the purpose of knocking down trees. They go in there to accomplish something. Every city that has to be reached by passing through the Capes and through Chesapeake Bay, according to the official testimony taken before the Committee on Appropriations, is impreguably fortified. Under those circumstances what necessity is there to spend $10,000,000 to gratify the desire of eminent and distinguished gentlemen to have what, in their opinion, would be a more perfect system of fortifications?

It is not contemplated that the fortifications within the Capes shall be abandoned if this project is authorized. It would be absolutely essential to retain them and to maintain them. If the gentlemen will be patient, within one or two years the range of guns may be so increased—and the range seems now to be increasing at a rapid rate—that very probably this suggestion to put defenses at Cape Henry may be abandoned, as the proposal to build the artificial island has been.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the decisions which hold that—

Mr. MANN. Is this on a point of order?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes. The decisions which hold that items upon a fortifications bill, new items for work not in progress, are not in order, are readily available. I cite a specific instance:

For the purchase of a site for the increase of the fortifications and for the enlargement of seacoast defense of New York Harbor, $1,000,000.

That amendment was offered on February 23, 1907, by the gentleman from New York, Mr. Waldo, and a point of order was interposed to it and sustained.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Does any one claim that this amendment is in order?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am taking time by the forelock, because nobody claimed for a hundred years that these defenses were necessary. But when a board was appointed and reexamined conditions at the entrance to the Chesapeake, a place at which money could be expended, although nobody had ever suggested it before, the result is these discussions.

In section 3611, volume 4, Hinds' Precedents, a decision was rendered on an amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. Maynard:

To make all necessary surveys, borings, and other investigations necessary for and the preparation of an accurate detailed statement of what it would cost to construct proposed artificial island for fortifications between Capes Charles and Henry, Chesapeake Bay, and to ascertain whether the title to the site of said proposed artificial island can be obtained without expense to the United States, $3,000.

A point of order was sustained upon that amendment upon the distinct ground that the introduction of a new item for work not in progress is not in order on the fortifications bill. This work is not in progress, and has not been authorized, and I submit it is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. This section of Hinds' Precedents, section 3611, in the opinion of the Chair is exactly in point:

While the fortifications appropriation bill carries general appropriations for a plan of work in progress, specific appropriations for individual works not authorized by law and not in progress are not in order thereon.

Now, in the opinion of the Chair the amendment offered falls within that category exactly, and the point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT.

The Chief of Ordnance, United States Army, is, in addition to appropriations heretofore made, hereby authorized to enter into contracts or otherwise incur obligations not to exceed $71,400 for the purchase, manufacture, and test of seacoast cannon for coast defenses, including their carriages, sights, implements, equipments, and the machinery necessary for their manufacture at the arsenals.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman make a short explanation of that first paragraph under the Ordnance Department? It makes no appropriation. I believe the current appropriation is something over $200,000, but there is a contract for $71,400.

Mr. SHERLEY. There were certain balances on hand in the Ordnance Department, and Gen. Crozier testified that if he was authorized to use the amount of $71,000 he could get along with the work that would be necessary to do or to contract for prior to the 4th of March next year. The estimate was $83,600, and he stated in the hearing that that estimate was a mistake, and that he found the sum necessary to do the work was $71,400.

Mr. MANN. Are these cannon all made under contract by people outside of the Government service?

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, no; the words are:

To enter into contracts or otherwise incur obligations.

Some of it is done by the Government and some of it by contract.

Mr. MANN. I did not quite see how the Government could incur an obligation in doing the work itself without having the money.

Mr. SHERLEY. It has the money on hand and would have money sufficient to pay this sum. All it wanted was an authorization for the expenditure of money that it had on hand for this purpose, and the language here is submitted by Gen. Crozier as being sufficient for the purpose.

Mr. MANN. That may be, but is it the purpose to purchase these cannon under contract or for the Government to make them?

Mr. SHERLEY. It is not the intention of the Government to put out at contract the making of these cannon. The Government, in point of fact, makes practically all of the cannon, though it does not make all of the carriages. Some of the work for carriages is done outside, but the actual making of the cannon is done by the Government, and there is no intention to change that policy.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill and amendments to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOUSTON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 20111) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, and had instructed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. SHERLEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Virginia rise?

Mr. LAMB. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider the agricultural appropriation bill, which was placed on the calendar before the bill of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER].

The SPEAKER. These two motions are of equal dignity, and the gentleman from New York had the floor first and is recognized. Now, if the House wants to take up the agricultural bill first, it can do it by voting down the motion of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LAMB. Our bill was on the calendar for days before the bill of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SULZER. The diplomatic appropriation bill was on the calendar long before the fortifications bill. I gave way for that. The diplomatic bill will only take a day to pass.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has stated the condition of things. The Chair has no jurisdiction about it, except to recognize the gentleman who first rises. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider the bill H. R. 19212, the diplomatic appropriation bill.

The question was taken, and the motion was lost.

Mr. SULZER. It is evident there are more farmers than diplomats in the House.

AGRICULTURE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider the bill H. R. 18960, the agricultural appropriation bill; and pending that, I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa if we can not agree on the time for general debate.

Mr. HAUGEN. I wish to say that I have requests for 4 hours and 35 minutes, and I am willing to agree on 9 hours' general debate.

Mr. LAMB. We can not agree to that on this side. If the gentleman will say 6 hours—3 hours on a side—I think we can make an agreement.

Mr. HAUGEN. I would agree to 4 hours on a side. I do not think I could possibly cut the time down below 4 hours.

Mr. LAMB. Then I move that we go on with the general debate without the agreement.

The SPEAKER. Before the Chair puts the motion he wishes to state once more, for the information of all concerned, that when the Unanimous Consent Calendar was established it was intended that that should take the place of the Speaker recognizing Members for unanimous consent; and the Chair proposes to enforce that rule.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Virginia, if possible, will agree to a time for general debate, so that the time may be controlled by the two sides. Without that it involves an extra loss of time. We very much desire four hours on this side, and we desire to use it legitimately.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the gentleman from Virginia, I wish to say to the gentleman from Illinois that the appropriation bills are behind in this session; that it is important that they should be pushed as rapidly as possible. I think after they are passed there will be opportunity for debate by all gentlemen on the floor of the House. The resolution distributing the President's message is now on the calendar. I have left it there without action upon it, so that when the appropriation bills are out of the way opportunity may be given for general debate on both sides if they want it. But I do not think that more than one day at this time ought to be devoted to general debate on an appropriation bill.

Mr. MANN. And yet that has always been the custom—to permit gentlemen who have prepared speeches on propositions to get in on general debate on appropriation bills, especially at this time in the session. A part of the discussion will be upon this bill and in relation to matters involved in the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois if he is willing to agree, without calling for a quorum, to night sessions for the purpose of debate?

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will not make that request at this time in the session. Later on we will have to do it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think it is far more important than any other question before the House that these bills should be sent to the Senate. There are several on the docket, and I will ask the gentleman if he is not willing to let the session run to-night until 10 o'clock and consume that much time in general debate?

Mr. MANN. I do not think it is right to ask the House to stay here to-night, nor do I think it makes any difference about the length of the session, whether these bills get over to the other end of the Capitol now or a month from now. Without making any reflection on that body, it has a peculiar way in relation to the passage of appropriation bills.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, in view of the statements made by the distinguished gentleman from Alabama and the distinguished gentleman from Virginia, I ask that general debate be limited to seven hours. That does not give me one minute to explain the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am sure that gentlemen will have time for general debate on other questions later on.

Mr. HAUGEN. I do not expect to take any time myself.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman is willing to agree that the session shall run to-night until 10 o'clock, I think there will be no trouble.

Mr. HAUGEN. Personally I do not care if it runs all night.

Mr. WICKLIFFE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama if to-morrow, being Calendar Wednesday, would not interfere with the completion of consideration of the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It would have to go over to-morrow, anyhow. If the gentleman from Iowa is willing to have seven hours' general debate, and take a recess from 6 o'clock until half past 7, I think this side of the House might accord the time he desires.

Mr. HAUGEN. I will state that one of the parties who desires time on this side is not ready to speak to-day, but prefers to have the time to-morrow.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There is another appropriation bill on the calendar to follow this, and I have no doubt that gentlemen can arrange to get time on that.

Mr. HAUGEN. In all probability the time there is limited.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Speaker, I still ask my colleague to agree to three hours on a side, or six hours for debate, and that would settle the whole matter.

Mr. HAUGEN. As I have stated, I have requests for 4 hours and 35 minutes, and I could not possibly agree to it. I will agree to three hours and a half on a side, or seven hours.

Mr. LAMB. Rather than do that and go into the Committee of the Whole House with the matter in abeyance I will give the gentleman half an hour of my time. We will have six hours, three hours to a side—

Mr. MANN. No; two and a half hours to one side and three and a half to the other.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman offers to give him 30 minutes of his time.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I do not know but I shall object—

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman's word is good.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. As I do not see why they should have any more time over there than we are to have over here.

Mr. LAMB. The gentleman ought not to object to my giving my own time.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. But you may steal that from me.

Mr. LAMB. I am going to take it from my own time. I renew my request that we have three hours' general debate on a side—six hours altogether—one half to be controlled by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] and the other half by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB] asks unanimous consent, pending the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, that general debate on this bill be limited to six hours, one half to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 18960) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, with Mr. BORLAND in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 18960, and the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 18960) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, in view of what was said here awhile ago, I will only occupy about one-half the time I intended to occupy.

Mr. Chairman, the act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture has heretofore attracted more general interest in this House than many of the larger supply bills. Certainly its provisions have been more closely scrutinized and more carefully discussed.

The reasons for this may be found in the fact that the activities of the department are widely extended and touch in a way a large proportion of our people in nearly every district represented on this floor.

This work is so well known to my colleagues here and so fully appreciated by the country that I do not deem it necessary to review the work of the past year nor to go into any general discussion of the provisions of this bill, save to point out some of the changes we have made and to give a few reasons for these changes.

In this connection, I call the attention of the Members of the House to the report of the Committee (No. 271) accompanying House bill 18960. A careful reading of this report will show the few increases. This will perhaps make unnecessary many of the questions usually asked by Members and save time to the House.

Under the act of May 26, 1910, making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture, a large number of the employees of the Department were transferred from the lump-sum fund to the statutory roll, so that there can be no increase in the salaries of these people save through action by Congress.

The Committee on Agriculture, bearing in mind the necessity for economy and following the lines of suggestion from various sources, declined to recommend many of the increases asked for in the estimates for the department, not only in the salaries of clerks and assistants, but also in the sums under the head of general expenses, cutting the estimates by $1,403,286.

In the Bureau of Entomology, whose accomplished chief recommended no increase over last year's appropriation, we felt constrained to increase the appropriation $35,000 in order to provide for the investigation of the Mediterranean fly in the United States and its possessions. This fly is very destructive in the Hawaiian Islands, and it becomes absolutely necessary to prevent it from entering the United States.

I desire to call careful attention to the increases of salaries of all clerks on the statutory roll who now receive less than $900 per annum. These are graded as follows: All clerks receiving less than $720 per annum, to receive $720; all clerks receiving between $720 and $840, to receive $840; all clerks receiving $840 or less than $900, to receive $900.

These increases affect 159 clerks, at salaries ranging from $600 to $840 and entail an expense of only $13,000.

These items are, of course, subject to a point of order, but we do not believe that any Member will desire to make a point of order on them.

The necessity for such action has been recognized in this House and often referred to when points of order were being made on items of increase of salaries over $1,200. Most likely this increase would have been made in previous appropriation bills save for the fear that the sum carried by such an appropriation would amount to many thousands of dollars and set a precedent for general appropriations in other departments.

I need not refer to the reasons that influenced the committee in recommending these increases. The high cost of living, or, in other words, the cheapening of money in this country, was the chief reason. The condition of these employees appeals to every one who has a heart to feel or a mind to think. Then, we believe that these people will be encouraged to do better work, or will do it more cheerfully, when their services are recognized and appreciated. I can well fancy 159 happier souls in this city when this bill becomes a law. Then I assume that in 100 cases we might multiply by 4 or 5, and that innocent children and loving mothers will send up prayers for the Committee on Agriculture.

The increases of salaries to those now drawing $1,200 and over are very few and sum up only $3,400.

The committee declined to recommend a number of the increases carried in the estimates, though doubtless many of these are meritorious, on account of the necessity of practicing as rigid economy as possible.

We doubt very much whether there is a business in this country employing a capital of $1,000,000 that has not increased its salary list to a larger extent in the past year than we do under this bill carrying $15,000,000.

I do not know that the thought occurred to any member of the majority on our committee that this increase was a good political move or not. If they harbored this idea, they gave no expression to it around our board. Nor did a single member of the minority intimate that anyone was playing politics.

And let me say right here, by way of parenthesis, that the minority members of our committee did not interpose in any way, by speech or vote, objection to the reduction in the estimates coming from the department. On the contrary, they seemed to recognize the necessity for economy, and helped, by suggestion and otherwise, in reaching the conclusions that we came to.

I may repeat here what I have said time and again in running debate on this floor when I was a minority member, that we have no politics on the Agricultural Committee. It is all business ticks, boll-weevil ticks, conservation ticks, cattle ticks, investigation ticks, and the ticks that breed close by the everglades in the "Sunny South." [Applause.]

The new places in this bill may provoke some criticism, but the necessity for these places will be shown at the proper time, when, under the five-minute rule, the cavalry, infantry, and artillery will move on the positions that we have taken with care and fortified with labor and are prepared to defend with patience, courage, and endurance.

The flying squadrons and the aviators have already been sending telegrams and night letters, predicting a destruction of all of our forests and great damage to the general welfare of the mighty kingdom known as forest reserves.

We are prepared to show that not a tree will be hurt nor the least harm come to any of the thousands who live, move, and thrive in the forests, in the rocky, woody regions, many acres of which the surveyor's chain has not been over nor the foot of man trod.

Our committee has given perhaps more attention to the Bureau of Forestry than to any other bureau.

They felt this to be necessary, and hope to be prepared to answer at least one-half of the questions usually asked when the forests are under discussion.

When the hearings on the Forest Service before the committee began, the chairman called attention to the subject in language like this:

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen of the committee, we will consider this morning the estimates of the department for the Bureau of Forestry. You will doubtless recall that when the bill was on the floor last year it was more severely criticized in relation to the estimates for this than any other of the bureaus. The former chairman of this committee, skilled in the use of language and fruitful in resources, had his patience and endurance taxed to the uttermost.

I invite the attention of this committee, as well as of Mr. Graves, the chief of this bureau, to the startling statements made on the floor in February and March of this year, as well as in 1910, when this appropriation bill was before the House. The statement was made that the Forest Service has spent more money in matters that do not directly relate to the preservation of forests in the reserves than in matters that do relate to that service. It was claimed that the Interior Department, with $350,000, protected the forests as well as they are protected now; that this amount protected one-third of the present area; and that $1,000,000 should give protection to the present area.

A few of us have watched the growth and development of this tremendous work, protesting mildly sometimes, but often earnestly, that the growth was abnormal and not healthy. We have seen the estimates increase from $1,000,000 in 1907 to $5,500,000 in 1912. The sales of timber and grazing permits furnish a good deal to the credit side of the account, and we hope will supply a much larger amount in the near future.

Since making this statement before the committee I have learned from the efficient Chief Forester, Mr. Graves, that the gross area of the national forests is 297,850 square miles, which is 1,000 square miles greater than the combined area of the German Empire, Switzerland, Holland, Denmark, Belgium, and Ireland.

The gross area of the national forests is greater than the area of Norway and Sweden taken together, and is greater than the combined area of France, England, Wales, and Ireland.

If you gentlemen will take the pains to glance over the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of last year, when this bill was before the House and the Forestry Bureau was being discussed, you will find that all kinds of objections and complaints were made of the operations of this bureau—some amusing, some to us almost ridiculous—and I invite the attention of Mr. Graves to this particular matter; I have no doubt he heard a part of it. We have to meet these objections. This is a business question, gentlemen, and a tremendous business question. Just bear in mind that the forests cover nearly 200,000,000 acres of land; perhaps in territory it is equal to New England and New York together.

Mr. GRAVES. More than that. The chief object is to protect these forests, guard them, and let the natural growth of the timber redound to the interests of the whole country, and to do that as economically as possible. During the course of this investigation, gentlemen, we will call out the fact that the Forestry Bureau is going into experimental work to a degree which some of us question, and we will draw Mr. Graves out on those points and endeavor to make this bill so practical that we can go before the House in confidence and meet the criticisms Members will make. Now, Mr. Graves, what do you prefer to do in this matter? We will hear you for awhile and then go through the bill.

You do not wonder after this suggestion that the committee examined the witnesses with great care and skill. No doubt every Member whose district embraces a forest reserve has read these hearings over several times.

In the preparation of this bill your committee did not lose sight of the condition of the revenues, and sought to reduce the expenses of the department wherever this could be done without injuring any of its activities.

It was found impracticable to make any considerable reduction in the great Bureaus of Plant Industry, Animal Industry, Chemistry, and so forth, although in most of these the estimates were cut from $20,000 to $50,000, as the report shows. The committee soon learned what the older Members well understood, that the Forest Service had received increases in the past few years for general expenses in experimental work and cooperative work with State colleges that might be dispensed with in part, so that these general expenses were cut to the amount of $383,370.

The item for the construction and maintenance of roads, trails, bridges, and so forth, has been reduced from $500,000 to $275,000, the amount of $275,000 being the same appropriation as of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911. This reduction was not only made in the interests of economy, but because the committee considered the sum sufficient for the necessary improvement and development of the national forests.

The emergency fund of $1,000,000 has been reduced to $200,000, because your committee could not see the necessity for holding this amount of money subject to the order of the Forest Service, when as a matter of fact only $22,000 of this fund has been called for at any time. The regular appropriation of $150,000, with the $200,000 emergency fund, we thought sufficient to meet the necessities of the situation.

While the total amount carried by this bill for the Forest Service is $5,000,000, in round numbers, let it be borne in mind that the receipts from the sale of forest products last year were over $2,000,000, from the following sources:

Received from timber sold.....	$1,014,769.84
Received from grazing.....	935,490.38
Received from various other sources.....	76,645.93

There was also a small return from water-power sites.

On page 286 of the hearings before the Committee on Agriculture you will find a statement giving the gross receipts for 1911 from every State in which there was a forest reserve. I call special attention of the House to these hearings, and would modestly suggest that a good deal of time would be saved and many questions answered by a careful perusal, on the part of the Members of the House, of these hearings.

The funds above referred to—receipts from the sale of forest products—were, of course, passed into the Treasury, so that there stands to the charge of the Forest Service $3,000,000 in round numbers.

When transportation facilities reach the present inaccessible forests and timber values increase, as they will under the unchanging law of supply and demand, we see no reason why the sale of ripe timber from these vast forests, together with the grazing permits, will not meet, or very nearly meet, all the various expenses of this Forest Service when economically administered.

In addition, I am fully persuaded that the grazing fees can be increased. These charges now average from 30 to 40 cents per head for cattle and from 10 to 12 cents for sheep for the entire year. They are, I understand, far below those paid for grazing privileges by private parties.

A moderate increase will add from $500,000 to $1,000,000 a year to forest receipts. I am sure the Secretary of Agriculture will carefully consider this matter. Indeed, I know he will, for his mind and heart are wrapped up in the success of the Agricultural Department over which he presides and to which he has devoted so many years of his useful life. For 15 years, as a member of the Committee on Agriculture, I have been thrown closely with the Secretary, and no Member of this House not one of his own party has had any better opportunity to observe his splendid qualities of head and heart that have made him a model officer and furnished the judgment and inspiration through which he has achieved magnificent results.

I cheerfully bear testimony to the efficiency of the corps of devoted men, unexcelled in their scientific attainments, who carry into effect the program marked out by the Secretary.

I have spent a month at a time inspecting the bureaus and divisions, and have made acquaintances and friends of the officers and employees.

It has been a painful duty to reduce the estimates the Secretary and his chiefs have submitted, but we felt constrained in the interests of economy to do this. They will doubtless apply this principle of economy themselves and prevent, as far as possible, the "lost motion" that must be guarded against in every great business enterprise.

Under the five-minute rule we will furnish any information Members may require touching the details of this bill. It has been prepared with all the calm deliberation we could command. The varied and far-reaching activities involved appeal to the hearts and consciences of the American people and, entering their homes, will be discussed around their firesides. We present it with confidence, and trust it will meet your approval. [Loud applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I now yield 35 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Moss].

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I regret that it becomes necessary, or, in my opinion, seems to be necessary, that I should utter a single word of criticism against an appropriation bill that has been prepared by a committee of this House a majority of the members of which belong to the Democratic Party, and yet our honored chairman has disarmed any remarks which I may make by stating that on the Agricultural bill we have no politics. I am glad that this statement is literally true.

The bill under consideration—the agricultural appropriation measure—allots the sum of $30,000 for the maintenance of the Referee Board for the ensuing fiscal year. The functions of this board were given especial consideration by your committee in the investigation of the Wiley episode and our inquiry into the whole executive machinery which is used in the enforcement and administration of the pure-food law. In the concluding paragraph of its report to this House—a report which was signed by every member of your committee—the following language is used:

Having arrived at these conclusions concerning the Referee Board, your committee can not recommend its further maintenance under its present status. It is the opinion of your committee that a board exercising the functions such as are exercised by the Referee Board, its decisions being given such far-reaching effects by the honorable Secretary, ought not to rest on the authority of an Executive order. If such board be deemed necessary or advisable in the administration of the pure-food law, its authority should be expressly conferred, its scope and jurisdiction clearly defined, and the effect of its decisions declared by act of Congress.

So far as I am informed, Mr. Chairman, this is the first expression by any committee of this House with reference to the Referee Board which is based on a careful study of its relations to the pure-food law.

For weeks this committee gave this subject faithful consideration and study, and though the members are not in accord at all points, there is absolute agreement that the pure-food law must not be unduly subjected to Executive modification and restriction; and if there are amendments to be made to this most important law, they must be proposed by Congress and not by the Secretary of Agriculture. The soundness of that conclusion, Mr. Chairman, has not been challenged by any authority, so far as my knowledge extends, and yet this item will tend to nullify this purpose and most probably will encourage the administration to resist the much-needed reorganization of the Bureau of Chemistry in the interest of a more efficient administration of the pure-food laws. I do not consider the item important if it be considered from a monetary standpoint. The bill carries a lump sum of more than $600,000 for the enforcement of this law, and if it were a question of doubt I would gladly give the benefit in favor of the law; but if we treat this item as tending to defeat the reorganization of the Bureau of Chemistry, and thereby prevent an effective enforcement of the law, then, Mr. Chairman, this item is of tremendous importance.

Indeed, sir, I will venture the assertion that no single question growing out of this legislation—as important as the agricultural appropriations are to the growth and permanent prosperity of our country—no single question, I repeat, will exceed this one in consuming interest to the whole American people or which will more vitally affect the political fortunes of the individual Members who are called upon to decide this issue by their votes. We need not seek to disguise the point in debate or to pretend that we are deciding one question when in fact we are determining another. The real question which we will decide—the record which we will establish for ourselves and for this House—is whether we demand a vigorous enforcement of the pure-food law in the interests of the consumers or whether we will longer submit to a “toning down” of its provisions in the interest of the producer and the purveyor of our food supplies. It is making a choice between the application of the law as Congress enacted it to check the waste in human life and the law as it has been modified to protect the commerce of our Nation. It is a return of that eternal struggle between right and wrong which began with the Creation and can end only with the Resurrection. The people are demanding the law in all its strength and virility; the manufacturers are praising the checks which executive authority has written into the law. The relative positions which the parties in interest are occupying are graphically depicted in the American Food Journal of February 15 in a cartoon “Roped and tied,” which presents Dr. Wiley tied by two ropes; one of the ropes is the recommendation for a Board of Food and Drug Inspection and the other one is the recommendation for a Referee Board. The Food Journal is an opponent of the activities of the Bureau of Chemistry and a partisan in favor of the Referee Board. We have thus graphically presented the issue in this debate, “Shall the Bureau of Chemistry be roped and tied by executive orders of the Secretary of Agriculture?” or shall Congress declare the relation which shall exist between the bureau and the reviewing authority?

This question should not have been raised in this appropriation bill. This department deals with the welfare of all the people of our Nation, and in years to come when history shall deal with Secretary Wilson and his public service his friends will lovingly dwell on his aid and assistance toward the development of agricultural science and will pass over in profound silence any connection with the much-advertised act of roping and tying Dr. Wiley. This whole controversy has recently been before the American people, and once more has a right decision been made, and the mandate which comes to this House out of our democracy of public opinion is to strike down the abuses in its administration; define by legislative enactment all grants of authority, and thus destroy the feuds and factional warfare which have scandalized our Nation.

The pure-food law—a statute which vitally affects the interests of every American citizen—says that the Bureau of Chemistry shall make examinations of specimens of foods and drugs for the purpose of determining if such articles are adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of the law. No other officer or bureau is given a like grant of power; it pertains exclusively to this division of the Government. The power thus conferred can destroy no legitimate business, nor can place no innocent person in jeopardy. The plea of big business for protection against the activities of the Bureau of Chemistry as guided by law is the plea of special interests for license against the common welfare, protected by the judiciary of our Nation. The Bureau of Chemistry has no power to convict or to acquit, and the extreme limit of their power is to collate and present information to the district attorney on which he can predicate an indictment and thus bring the cause to trial before a court of justice. Every regularly impaneled grand jury in the United States has equal power. As well, then, insist on restraining the power of our grand juries to investigate crime and present indictment therefor as to complain of the power of the Bureau of Chemistry to destroy honest business by making examinations to detect dishonest practices. If the decision of the bureau shall be that an innocent person has adulterated or misbranded articles of food or drugs, the alleged offender is not thereby convicted of crime and can not be punished under the law. The only authority which the Secretary of Agriculture has in the premises is to notify the accused party and give him a hearing under the regulations adopted by the three Secretaries to determine if the findings of the Bureau of Chemistry are free from error, and if he shall so find, then he certifies the case to the proper Federal court and the district attorney is required to institute prosecutions against the accused parties without delay. This is the simple procedure of the law as has been determined by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Moss] yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Lever]?

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. LEVER. In that connection I would like to ask my friend from Indiana if there is any authority in section 4 of the pure-food law by which there can be created such a board as the present Remsen Board as the last court of appeals on propositions concerning the misbranding of food, and so forth, in his judgment?

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I am not a lawyer; but if there is authority in any section of the pure-food law which would give the power to create a referee board and give it any legal function or power whatever, except what the Secretary of Agriculture in his own discretion may accept, I have never found that authority or heard anyone point it out.

Mr. LEVER. Is it a fact that even the Department of Justice has differed upon the proposition as to whether or not there was such authority in the pure-food law for the creation of such a board?

Is it not a fact that the Attorney General holds one view of the situation and some of his strong subordinates who have looked into the question carefully hold different views upon the proposition?

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. It is true, Mr. Chairman, that Mr. Fowler, when he was Assistant Attorney General of the United States, prepared an opinion in which he declared that there was no authority under the law for the creation of the referee board, but that was overruled, and the Attorney General held that there is authority.

Mr. LEVER. And the gentleman's committee—and I desire to say that his committee has done splendid service—

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Thank you for that.

Mr. LEVER (continuing). Has held, with the Assistant Attorney General, Mr. Fowler, that there was no authority in the pure-food law for the creation of such a board as the Remsen Board.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. I think it would be fairer, Mr. Chairman, to say that our committee raised that question, but did not pass finally upon it.

Mr. HIGGINS. Do I understand the gentleman to say now that his committee, the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture, did not find that the Referee Board was legally created?

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. If the gentleman had waited until I had got through with my answer he would have understood what I said.

Mr. HIGGINS. I beg the gentleman's pardon. But the questions of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Lever] would certainly lead the Members present to the conclusion that the Expenditures Committee in their report found that no law existed for the creation of that board.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. With all due deference to the gentleman from Connecticut, I would rather suppose that the gentleman from South Carolina expected the gentleman from Indiana to answer that question.

Mr. HIGGINS. The report speaks for itself, and I am willing to rest on that.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. I say it would have been nearer correct to say that the Committee on Agriculture raised that question without determining it. The decision of the Committee on Expenditures in the Agricultural Department, as I understand it, is this: That the Secretary of Agriculture had the power to create any board which was necessary to aid him in the proper discharge of his duty. Does the gentleman from Connecticut agree to that statement?

Mr. HIGGINS. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me, in view of the report which the gentleman's committee made, that we might dispose of this matter, so far as the legality of the Referee Board is concerned, very quickly, and I had supposed in that report the gentleman had disposed of it. And I would really like to know if the gentleman is contending that the Referee Board to-day is illegally constituted.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. The gentleman from Indiana has not made that statement.

Mr. HIGGINS. Will the gentleman be kind enough to say whether he finds, as a matter of fact, that the Referee Board is illegally constituted?

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. The gentleman is perfectly willing to repeat the language of the report. There may be authority.

Mr. HIGGINS. If the gentleman does not want to answer my question, I will not press it.

Mr. LEVER. I understood the chairman of the committee to say that the committee had not passed upon the proposition of the legality of the board; but I would like to ask the chairman if it is not a fact that the committee did pass upon the proposition as to whether or not the Remsen Board, as at present constituted, should be continued? If the report did not show that the Remsen Board ought to have its functions set out by law; either that, or it ought to be discontinued?

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. The decision of the committee has been stated—that is, the committee declined to recommend a further maintenance of the Referee Board unless on the theory that it be deemed necessary or advisable for the proper enforcement of the pure-food laws.

Mr. HIGGINS. Is it held it was illegal?

Mr. LEVER. I take it, of course, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, as to whether or not the board ought to be continued is a matter for the decision of Congress and not for the Secretary of Agriculture or the President of the United States.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. That is my own opinion, and that is what I am attempting to establish in these remarks which I am submitting to the committee.

The honorable Secretary was not content to take this simple and evident meaning of the law. He preferred rather to elevate the dignity of his high office and to increase his official power. Speaking to this point, the united voice of your committee said:

Your committee does not question the motives or the sincerity of the Secretary of Agriculture, whose long service at the head of the Department of Agriculture has been of signal service to the American people. From the beginning, however, the honorable Secretary has apparently assumed that his duties in the proper enforcement of the pure-food law are judicial in character, whereas, in fact, they are wholly administrative and ministerial. This misconception of the law is fundamental and has resulted in a complex organization within the Department of Agriculture, in the creation of offices and boards to which have been given, through Executive order, power to overrule or annul the findings of the Bureau of Chemistry.

In this indefinite grant of authority to review the findings of the Bureau of Chemistry is the weakness of the law. No sane mind can study this question with a due regard to the vast interest involved and fail to reach the conclusion that there should be a review of the findings in the presence of the person who is accused of fraud and crime, but this grant of authority should be definitely written in the law and the relation between the bureau and the review board should be clearly defined. Thus we will avoid the disputes over relative rank and authority which has nearly proven fatal to the efficiency of this great department of our Government under present conditions.

The central idea of the pure-food law is that the Bureau of Chemistry, with its splendid technical equipment, shall pursue special investigations to discover evidences of adulterations and of fraud in foods and drugs. This preliminary work should be subjected to careful review by expert authority, because the law should be a shield to honest manufacturers as well as to honest consumers. The only class of our citizenship which should fear the execution of the pure-food law is the crook—the man who desires to obtain dollars without giving value received. But it is undeniable that many honest dealers are afraid of the decisions of the Bureau of Chemistry. This is true of many who have no good reason to fear that their business will ever be subjected to any adverse decision of the Bureau of Chemistry. If the Referee Board had the support only of those who may expect to profit from its decisions, this debate need not occur to-day. Every grain exchange in the country is excited over the question of grading of grain; a convention is called to meet in St. Louis to take measures for protection, and Members are receiving urgent telegrams to support the Referee Board as a protection to the grain exchange against the activities of the Bureau of Chemistry. The Referee Board has no possible connection with this class of cases and never can have. There is no allegation of adulteration; only of misbranding in that the grade of grain is changed.

I have stated, in the course of these remarks, that I do not question the sincerity of the Secretary of Agriculture because he misconstrued the law.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. MADDEN. I understood the gentleman to say that he believed the findings of the chief chemist should be subject to review by a scientific board?

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. That is my opinion; yes, sir.

Mr. MADDEN. Is the Remsen Board a scientific board, in the gentleman's opinion?

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. I have no reason to doubt it.

Mr. MADDEN. I will ask the gentleman to state what is the objection to the Remsen Board?

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. I will state it before I get through. Would the gentleman like me to state it now?

Mr. MADDEN. I would like very much, if it is not interfering with the trend of the gentleman's remarks to have him state it.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. I would like to defer that until later, because I shall speak directly on that subject later on in my remarks.

Mr. MADDEN. Very well.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. I will say the same of Dr. Wiley and his associates on the board in their course of extending the pure-food law in an attempt to govern the grain exchanges of this country. I am a farmer and know that we need most urgently a uniform system of grading grain. I will welcome such a measure, as it will give the farmers of this country large relief from the present system which permits, in many cases, the buying of grain at a lower grade and selling the same grain at a higher grade. No well-informed man will deny that such a practice is prevalent and that it is not commercially honest; but the pure-food law was not enacted to control the sale of grain in the ordinary course of exchange in the commercial centers of our country. The millers are justly entitled to receive the grade of grain for which they have paid; the farmers are justly entitled to be paid for the grade of grain which they actually deliver to the purchaser; but the Bureau of Chemistry, acting under the pure-food law, is not the proper arbiter of these transactions; and neither the Referee Board nor Board of Food and Drug Inspection has any call to expend public funds to investigate the grades of grain under the presumption that they are protecting the public health.

If the pure-food law makes it the duty of the Bureau of Chemistry to fix the grade of grain in car lots which enter interstate commerce, and gives to it the power to declare that a grade which has been regularly and officially established by local authority is a misbranding under the pure-food law, then we are in urgent need of an amendment to the law which will make it possible to sell grain legally. Grain is sold by sample or by grade, and at the present time the grade is determined as between buyer and seller in most commercial centers by officials appointed for that purpose and who do not represent either the buyer or the seller. Neither party to the trade agreement can avoid accepting the grade thus established, and the price follows the grade, so far as State commerce is concerned. If this grain enters interstate commerce, it will be reinspected at the center where it next changes ownership, and this grade will likewise govern the parties in interest.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question right there, please?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman from Indiana undertake to say that the United States Government fixes the grades of grain?

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. I say that under the rulings of the Bureau of Chemistry they attempt to do that very thing.

Mr. MADDEN. Is there any law that gives the United States Government the right to inspect the wheat and corn and oats that is sold in the markets of the United States?

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. It is a question arising under the pure-food law. The pure-food law undoubtedly covers the sale of all foods, and under the present ruling they would probably undertake also the supervision of the sale of grain.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana this question: Has anybody undertaken to determine the purity of the grain as it comes from the fields?

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. I would state to the gentleman that I will insert in my remarks notice of judgment No. 1135, which gives exactly the information he wishes. The notice is as follows:

F. & D. No. 1123.
I. S. No. 48310-a.

Issued November 9, 1911.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY.

NOTICE OF JUDGMENT No. 1135.

(Given pursuant to section 4 of the food and drugs act.)

ADULTERATION AND MISBRANDING OF NO. 2 RED WHEAT.

On January 28, 1911, the United States attorney for the western district of Missouri, acting upon a report by the Secretary of Agriculture, filed information in four counts in the district court of the United States for said district against the Hall Baker Grain Co., a corporation, Kansas City, Mo., alleging shipment by it, in violation of the food and drugs act, on or about May 3, 1909, from the State of Missouri into the State of Texas of a carload of wheat which was invoiced and sold as No. 2 red wheat, and which was adulterated and misbranded.

Examination of samples of said wheat by the dairy and food commissioner of the State of Texas, acting under the authority of the Secretary of Agriculture, showed the product to contain 33 per cent hard wheat and 7 per cent mixed wheat. Misbranding was alleged in the first count of the information, for the reasons that said wheat was offered for sale and sold under the distinctive name of another article of food, to wit, red wheat, another and different article of food than the contents of said car, namely, mixed wheat; and because said wheat was labeled and marked so as to deceive and mislead the purchaser thereof into the belief that it was red wheat, when in fact it was not red wheat, but was mixed wheat. Misbranding was alleged in the second count for the reasons that said wheat was offered for sale and sold under the distinctive name of another article of food, to wit, No. 2 red wheat, another and different article of food than the contents of said car, namely, mixed wheat; and because said wheat was labeled and marked so as to deceive and mislead the purchaser thereof into the belief that it was No. 2 red wheat, when in fact it was not No. 2 red wheat, but was mixed wheat. Adulteration was alleged in the third count for the reasons that other and different substances and articles, to wit, various kinds and grades of wheat, had been mixed and packed with said wheat so as to reduce, lower, or injuriously affect the quality and strength of said wheat, and because other and different substances, to wit, various kinds and grades of wheat, had been substituted in part for the wheat represented to have been sold and shipped as red wheat; and further because a valuable constituent or part of the wheat sold and shipped and represented as red wheat had been in part abstracted and removed; that is to say, a certain portion of red wheat had been abstracted and removed therefrom and a like quantity of various kinds and grades of wheat inferior and less valuable had been substituted therefor. Adulteration was alleged in the fourth count for the reasons that other and different substances and articles, to wit, various kinds and grades of wheat, had been mixed and packed with said wheat so as to reduce, lower, and injuriously affect its quality and strength; that other and different substances, to wit, various kinds and grades of wheat, had been substituted in part for the wheat represented and pretended to have been sold and shipped, to wit, No. 2 red wheat; that a valuable constituent or part of the wheat sold and shipped, to wit, No. 2 red wheat, had been in part abstracted and removed; that is to say, a certain portion of No. 2 red wheat had been abstracted and removed therefrom, and a like quantity of various kinds and grades of wheat inferior and less valuable had been substituted therefor; and that said wheat was mixed and packed with other kinds and grades of wheat in a manner whereby damage and inferiority were concealed.

Under this ruling, if at Indianapolis a carload of wheat has been inspected and graded as No. 2 wheat, and it is consigned to Chicago and thus enters interstate commerce, and the inspector of the Bureau of Chemistry comes along and decides that it is not No. 2 wheat but some other grade, then, under the decisions and rulings of the bureau, that grain is liable to be seized on the ground that it has been misbranded.

Mr. MADDEN. What I want to ask the gentleman from Indiana is this: By what authority of law does the Agricultural Department assume to say what the standard of grain is?

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. They do not attempt to say what the standard of grain is, but under the pure-food law one must deliver exactly what one sells. Thus it is that if a miller in Illinois buys No. 2 wheat and makes that trade with a citizen of Indiana, and there is shipped over what is No. 2 wheat in Indianapolis, but when it gets to Peoria, for example, it is graded as No. 3, that miller has the right to complain, and it is claimed that he has bought something which is misbranded under the law.

Mr. MADDEN. I understood that the pure-food law had to do with manufactured food products. Am I to understand that the pure-food law includes in its scope an inspection of agricultural food products?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. With pleasure.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to state that the matter of the standardizing of grain has been pending before the Committee on Agriculture for 10 years, I presume, and that committee has invariably declined to pass upon that proposition, so that if there is an attempt on the part of the Bureau of Chemistry, through the exercise of any power under the pure-food law, to regulate the standards of grain, or attempt to standardize grain, then they are doing it under what I conceive to be a contravention of the judgment of the House of Representatives.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. There is no question, Mr. Chairman, but that at least one suit has been taken into court on a question of that kind and decided on that very point. There have been other suits in which the parties at interest have settled by withdrawing the tender and making it satisfactory to the Bureau of Chemistry under the very point I am discussing.

Mr. MADDEN. There is one point that I would like to get information upon, and that is how the chemist in charge of the Bureau of Chemistry in the Agricultural Department gets the inspectors to give him information upon which he bases a judgment as to the purity or standard of the various grains. Are they appropriated for by the Committee on Agriculture?

Mr. LAMB. I do not believe they are. I have no knowledge of their having been appropriated for.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. He gets it by seizures by traveling inspectors as other specimens of foods and drugs are collected for examination by the Bureau of Chemistry. This brings up incidentally the question or the right to sell sulphured oats. A very large trade has grown up in this country whereby dealers sulphur oats as they come from the farm and sell them as a special grade of oats, under a distinctive trade name. This grade of oats is recognized in every grain exchange in the United States. Elevator men sell them as a distinct grade and dealers order them by grade. Every party to the transaction is on notice, and no one can be imposed on or deceived unless it is the horse who eats the oats. There is no question or allegation of adulteration; only misbranding and fraud by raising the grade of the oats; that is, buying them as one grade and selling them as a different and higher grade. But all parties are well aware of the grade of grain, and it seems to me that we have gone a long way to look for dishonesty and fraud if the National Government feels impelled to intervene between two citizens in commerce, the one offering an article under a distinctive name and the other purchasing it because it is of that particular grade.

If in transit the Federal authorities shall exercise the right to inspect the grain, and if their judgment shall differ from that of the last inspector, and that this difference shall constitute a misbranding under the pure-food law, then insuperable difficulties have been added to the grain trade of our country, which it is the imperative duty of this House to remove by enacting amendments which will make it possible for a farmer to sell a carload of wheat or oats without violating the pure-food law or being compelled to defend a suit before a Federal court at the instance of our Federal authorities.

This well illustrates the absolute necessity of Congress clearly defining the authority, scope, and jurisdiction of these executive boards and of defining the effect of any decisions which they may deliver. If this were done, we will have no necessity for one of these boards and will escape the scandals which have followed the transactions of each, for in each of them has public funds been wasted and the purpose of the law has been exceeded.

The Bureau of Chemistry in its work of investigating and examining specimens to discover evidence of adulteration and fraud has expended $1,990,354 of public funds and has reported on approximately 27,000 specimens. Of this number 9,866 cases were reported as alleged violations of law. Reviewing this work of the Bureau of Chemistry through the board of food and drug inspection the Secretary has abated 6,202 of these cases by failing or refusing to certify them to the district courts for prosecution. Thus approximately two-thirds of all cases recommended for prosecution by the bureau has been reversed by the Secretary or some authority appointed by him for that purpose.

The larger number was abated on the advice of the Board of Food and Drug Inspection, composed of Dr. Wiley, Dr. Dunlap, and Solicitor McCabe. The records show that Dr. Wiley voted to sustain the findings of the bureau and order prosecutions in two-thirds of all the cases, but was overruled by Dr. Dunlap and Solicitor McCabe. If it so happened that Dr. Dunlap voted with Dr. Wiley to sustain the bureau, and thus favor a prosecution, and Solicitor McCabe afterwards voted in opposition, to abate the case, then in every such instance Dr. Dunlap changed his vote to agree with McCabe, and thus prevented the prosecution of the case. These recommendations of the board came to Secretary Wilson for approval, but in every one of the 6,202 cases the Secretary was exactly of the same opinion as was the majority of the board; in no single instance did he sustain Dr. Wiley if the doctor was opposed by Dunlap and McCabe.

The next progressive step looking toward the effacement of Dr. Wiley from the enforcement of the pure-food law was in the composing of order No. 140, an order wholly illegal and as vicious from an administrative standpoint as it was invalid from a legal standpoint. The lust for power and the lengths to which an official will go to satisfy his longing when assailed by such temptation is well illustrated in this instance. Proposing, for economy's sake principally, to have but one legal office in the Department of Agriculture—a proposal wholly in the interest of good administration—the purpose grew until on the slender grant of authority to effect a commendable economy the power of the Solicitor was projected in giant strength over the Bureau of Chemistry in opposition both to law and to economy of administration. Under the terms of this order, which was written by McCabe and signed by Secretary Wilson, all the Bureau of Chemistry did, and all it was given the power to do, was to make the examination of specimens and then send them over to the Solicitor's office to have the examination completed by a decision whether the specimens were adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of the law. The Secretary had as well have closed Dr. Wiley's office in the Bureau of Chemistry with a big signboard, "See McCabe." What this means in administrative results is clearly shown by the record. The Bureau of Chemistry spent $1,190,784 in examining cases, not one of which was reported to the Federal courts for prosecution. It cost the Government $515.95 to make the examination in the Bureau of Chemistry for every case which was reported for prosecution.

Commenting on this record, your committee said:

It does not require comment to sustain a conviction that either too many cases were prepared in the Bureau of Chemistry or too many were abated in the Board of Food and Drug Inspection.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to trespass upon the time of the committee, but I had an understanding with the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture that I was to have more time, or at least that he would ask for it.

Mr. LAMB. I yield to the gentleman 5 minutes more.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. I do not think 5 minutes will do; but if the gentleman will give me 10 minutes more I think I can complete the statement I wish to make. I wish to say that since I have been here I have taken up no time, and I should like at least an opportunity to finish my remarks on this subject, if it will not trespass too much on the indulgence of the committee.

Mr. LAMB. I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call attention to the fact that the committee can not extend the time; but the gentleman in charge of the time can yield any time he desires.

Mr. LAMB. I have yielded to the gentleman 10 minutes.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Take either alternative; this is a record which this House can not indorse with due regard for the proper expenditure of public funds. It is indisputable evidence that there is urgent need for a reorganization and reform in the executive machinery which has been devised to carry this law into effect. The business world, in a ferment of fear lest they be destroyed, and the consuming public with ample knowledge that it is largely a case of "fuss and feathers," with many abatements and few prosecutions.

An exception must be noted, however, when the offender happened to be Dr. Wiley; for while thousands of alleged violators of the law were leisurely traveling the road which leads away from the doors of the Federal courts it was impossible for Dr. Wiley to escape when accused of disregarding an order regulating the wages of expert witnesses at court. Not content with depriving Dr. Wiley of the rightful power and dignity of his office, there must needs be a desperate effort to destroy and to drive from office the man whose labors have done more to protect the lives, the health, and the daily income of the great consuming masses of our citizens than any other man of our generation. [Applause.]

Good name in man and woman, dear my lord,
Is the immediate jewel of their souls.
Who steals my purse steals trash; 'tis something, nothing;
But he that filches from me my good name
Robs me of that which not enriches him,
And makes me poor indeed.

It is not possible to compute the value in money of the services of Dr. Wiley to the American people. It is not possible to know the total number of lives he has saved by his warfare against the sale of impure drugs, or to estimate the value of his services in the cause of commercial honesty. In all of these directions he has been the acknowledged leader of the Nation and has fought the good fight by keeping the faith. It is not surprising that such service should earn the rancor of those whom he has exposed, whose damnable methods he has discovered, and whose illegitimate profits he has destroyed. That is a part of the price which honesty must pay for the privilege of warfare against dishonesty. It is a badge of honor which the honest man and upright official is proud to wear in the presence of his enemy; but the mystery is that this spirit of hostility could invade the sanctuary which is guarded by the flag of freedom and of justice and secure false indictment against an official who had offended, if offense could be found, by his fidelity to the duties and obligations of his office.

The Referee Board is not authorized by any express provision of law—

Mr. HAMILL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. HAMILL. I understand it is established by an interpretation of the law made by the Secretary of Agriculture and confirmed by an opinion of the Attorney General. Is that so?

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. That is correct, so far as the present status is concerned. I have only a very few minutes left and I should like to complete my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Indeed, section 9 of the bill as it passed this House and which authorized such a board was deliberately stricken from the bill in the Senate. Thus the weight of legislative intent is opposed to the board. This leaves it as one of these modern creations whereby the executive branch of Government seeks to place its will above the mandates of Congress. Commissions are often resorted to by Congress as an expedient to delay the enactment of remedial legislation; and they are commonly organized by the Executive when it is the wish to tone down reform legislation which the people have secured by legislative enactment. In this instance it would seem that the desire is to prevent the Bureau of Chemistry from exercising the functions given under section 4 of the law. No one will seriously question the authority or the propriety of the Secretary of Agriculture to review the findings of the Bureau of Chemistry to discover errors in their examinations. The Board of Food and Drug Inspection was created expressly to perform this duty. The referee board was organized on the theory that the Secretary of Agriculture has the power to determine the question of purity in foods and drugs independently of any examination by the Bureau of Chemistry. He asserted that the law spoke to him; that the enforcement of it was in his hands; and that it was necessary for him to know definitely whether certain articles are deleterious when added to foods.

Thus a question of purity which has not been considered by the Bureau of Chemistry can as readily be referred to the referee board as one which had been so considered, and by such action deny to the bureau the right to make such examination. To quote the Secretary's language to the fruit growers of California:

I will tell you what to do. Just go on as you used to go on, and I will not take any action to seize your goods or let them be seized or take any case into court until we know more about the number of milligrams to the kilo and all that.

The food business is the biggest branch of business in the Nation, and for one man to assert that it is within his power to say what may be sold and what products shall not be sold in our markets, vacating all lawful processes and denying adjudication by the courts, but in their stead arbitrarily submitting these most important questions to personal appointees holding office at his will, exercising just so much or so little power as he may determine, is most truly an exercise of kingly prerogative.

When a question is submitted to the Referee Board there can be no expression of judgment except on the precise form submitted by the Secretary. On this point Dr. Remsen said before our committee, in speaking of his experiments with benzoate of soda:

We were asked the plain question whether or not it was harmful in small doses or in large doses. When we answered that question our duty was ended.

The most important problem, whether such substances are used to preserve partly decayed material and thus conceal inferiority and lead to fraud, could be given no consideration at all, because it was not included in the question asked by the Secretary when he submitted the subject. But the honorable Secretary was not content to limit the functions of this board to such purposes as were indicated in the order which organized these experts into a board; he was like the ancient king who issued his orders to the waves of the sea. If the board said "thumbs up" to the Department of Agriculture, then thumbs must go up in the States as well as the Nation. Accordingly, acting at the request of an attorney for private corporations, he sent three members of the Referee Board, in violation of their conception of dignity and propriety, and exposing them to just criticism, to appear in court in aid of these corporations in their attacks against the pure-food law of the State of Indiana. The following correspondence well illustrates the reluctance of the board and the zeal of the Secretary in applying these new functions of the Referee Board:

PROUTS NECK, ME., September 9, 1909.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: The Referee Board is going to be subjected to very severe criticism for testifying in the Indiana suit, and in order to protect ourselves it is our desire that we should have from you a written request that we should give this testimony. I hope you will have no objection to sending this request to me. We are to testify at Seal Harbor, Me., on the 17th. My address until that time will be Prouts Neck, Me.

We are all glad to have been to Denver, and we all recognize the soundness of your judgment in asking us to go.

Yours, very truly,

IRA REMSEN,

Chairman Referee Board.

One can not withhold sympathy from the president of a great university in his extremity, which forced him to write such a piteous appeal in order to hold a Government job at $2,000 per year. Dr. Remsen and his associates had better suffered the fate of Dr. Robinson, who was discharged by Secretary Wilson because he would not yield to the Secretary's views on this question, and if proof were needed that this board should not be continued under its present status no stronger presentation can be made than in this particular instance. Dr. Remsen absolutely refused to appear as a witness for the Curtice Bros. when approached by Mr. Baldwin, attorney for that firm.

Later at Denver, where Secretary Wilson had assembled the members of the Referee Board in a grand attempt to strangle the just criticism which was directed against his administration of the pure-food law by the State boards of health, a member of the firm of Curtice Bros. approached Dr. Remsen again to ask his aid and assistance in the Indiana suit. Dr. Remsen consulted the board, and they decided that it was not their business to give assistance to the corporations in their lawsuits against public interests and the health laws of States, and notified Mr. Curtice accordingly. Here was a decision by the Referee Board as truly as any decision which has been given by that body, and one which, if it had been adhered to, would have commended them to the confidence of the country in a greater measure than any other decision which they have uttered. The country does not blindly follow Dr. Wiley as an infallible guide; they know he may make mistakes, but they also know that he can not be controlled. How happy would it have been had Dr. Remsen and his associates established a similar reputation before the people of our country by refusing to yield their convictions on this question; but following the repeated refusal of Dr. Remsen and his associates to enter the court room in the interest of Curtice Bros., Mr. Baldwin, their attorney, entered the office of Secretary Wilson. The purpose of that visit and its result is told under oath before your committee by Mr. Baldwin. He stated that he found the Secretary in doubt as to the propriety of the appearance of the board, but that it did not take him—Mr. Baldwin—15 minutes to get the Secretary to change his mind and to agree that the board should give their testimony in the Indiana suit, as so ardently desired by the Curtice Bros.

Accordingly he wired Dr. Remsen as follows:

TRAER, IOWA, September 13, 1909.

IRA REMSEN, Prouts Neck, Me.

It is my request that the testimony be given at Seal Harbor or wherever the decisions of the Referee Board are questioned.

JAMES WILSON.

Having thus ordered his board to testify whenever and wherever corporations are fighting the enforcement of State pure-food legislation, it only remained to violate the law by the expenditure of public funds to defray the expenses of these members when attending court as expert witnesses for private corporations. And this was done, whether in a spirit of irony or through sheer recklessness, from the money appropriated by Congress to enforce the pure-food law of the Nation.

The Federal pure-food law has done much to protect the people from gross evils in the matter of foods and drugs; it could have accomplished much more good if the central thought in its administration had been the consumer rather than the producer. This change in administrative policy must be made. In a recent issue of the Outlook, the following editorial language is used:

The American people are now thoroughly convinced that they have in the past not infrequently eaten bread baked in filthy bakeries, meat packed in filthy packing houses, and preserved and canned foods composed of filthy materials and containing poisonous chemicals introduced for the purpose of concealing the filth.

Under such indictment is this House going to hesitate to take a step forward? Are you willing to stand side by side with the manufacturers who have founded the "association for the promotion of purity in foods"? This association is composed solely of "manufacturers or distributors of strictly pure American-made food products." I am proud that every food manufacturer in the State of Indiana is qualified for membership in this most patriotic and law-abiding association. The following is a clause from its constitution:

The aim of the association is to elevate standards in American prepared and semiprepared foods of all kinds by an insistence upon strict purity; the employment of only sound, wholesome raw material; the entire and absolute omission from foods of artificial chemical preservatives and recognized harmful artificial colors of any and all kinds; and the maintenance of a high degree of sanitation of premises and surroundings in establishments where food is prepared—to the end that increased public confidence in prepared foods may be secured, to the mutual and lasting benefit of both the consumer and the reliable food manufacturers.

The membership of this association do not desire a referee board to stand between them and the Federal courts.

I am in favor of a board of review, created by law, whose duties shall be to pass upon the findings of the Bureau of Chemistry in connection with the representations of the manufacturer who composed the product under examination. This board should supersede the Referee Board and the present Board of Food and Drug Inspection. The Secretary of Agriculture should be relieved from all responsibility of making these decisions, except to nominate well-qualified officials to fill the board, and the decisions of this board should be final until they are passed upon by the Federal courts. The Secretary of Agriculture should be a farmer and not a chemist. His paramount duties should be to promote the agricultural wealth and industry of the country and not to decide innumerable questions as to the effects of drugs and salts on the human system.

But we can not secure this change unless we refuse to support the present clumsy machinery. We can not stand with the progressive manufacturers and distributors of food supplies if we vote to support the Referee Board in its present status. Public opinion is awake; progressive sentiment is in the ascendant; let us join the movement. Let us refuse this appropriation and then pass an amendment to the pure-food law which will authorize a board of review with authority to decide these moot questions, not in any narrow form which may be prescribed in a formal statement, not in small doses or in large doses, but decide them in the manner best calculated to protect the health of the consumer, the honest dollar of the buyer, and the honest profits of the producer. Let us give the whole American people—the producer, the purveyor, and the consumer—the greatest possible benefit from a law which, when rightfully administered, will distribute its benefits like the dews of heaven on everyone alike.

MR. LAMB. I will ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] to use some of his time now.

MR. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 45 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY].

MR. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, on March 25, 1908, I called the attention of the House by some remarks to the fact that there was a large body of land in Oregon granted to the Oregon & California Railroad Co., upon the condition that such lands were to be sold to settlers in certain areas and at a fixed price, and that the company was refusing to comply with the law. By reason of action taken subsequently, in which I took an active part, a resolution already passed by the Senate, was passed by the House, submitting the matter to the courts to determine the rights of the United States, the people, and the company; and so far as the proceedings now pending in the United States District Court for Oregon are concerned the passage of this resolution was and is the sole cause and basis for the institution of the suit.

The passage of this resolution was due in no way to ill will toward the railroad company, either on the part of myself or of the people of Oregon, but to the much broader and sounder reason that the development of the State was being retarded by the refusal of the holding company to sell the lands as required by law. It was desired that the lands be improved and otherwise put to beneficial use.

I come to-day to present for the consideration of the House another important problem relating to the improvement and development of now unused lands, not only in Oregon, but in all the public-land States. This is the matter of dealing with settlers on the public domain, the consideration of proofs made upon entries, and the issuance or denial of patents. The nature of the case is indicated by the questions frequently asked of me by persons desiring to make homes on the public lands, such as, "Can I get a patent?" "Is the Government issuing patents?"

So great are the difficulties experienced by settlers in securing patents, so many the official hardships they are subjected to, that a belief seems to be extant that the Government is not giving lands to settlers, or that the conditions under which they are given are almost impossible of fulfillment. As a result vast areas of good land, unprofitable in their present wild state, are not being reduced to cultivation for the benefit of the people of this country, but instead the men and women who should be doing this are going to Canada in considerable numbers. An effective and reasonable remedy for this state of affairs is greatly needed.

The Government by its most solemn act provides that its citizens shall acquire title to tracts of land if they comply with certain definite requirements. Whether they do so comply is a matter of judgment and information, naturally to be determined by investigation upon the ground and the testimony of credible witnesses who are acquainted with the facts. The Government requires residence, improvements, and cultivation. This refers, of course, to homestead entries. The amount of improvement and cultivation depend somewhat upon the life of the entry, the nature of the land, its surface cover, if any, its condition and distance from market, the financial circumstances of the entryman, his physical strength, industry, and experience. Settlers are usually people of very limited means, whose principal capital is the ability and willingness to do hard labor. They usually are not able to hire assistance, can buy few, if any, beasts of labor, and are able to purchase implements or powder only to a very limited extent. Frequently they are dependent almost entirely upon their bodily strength. A man of some means can make more improvement and do more cultivation in the required time than can one without means, but his good faith may be no greater. The test of good faith is in the intent of the entryman, and the evidence of that intent is shown by his complying with the law to the best of his ability. The evidence of his neighbors as to his diligence is most important information in determining his good faith. An investigator who comes casually to inspect an entry may report what he thinks is right and with honest intent, but his conclusions may be far from correct. The rights of an entryman are as susceptible of proof as any other right to property, and he ought to have the same protection in his rights as any owner of property, where acquired by his exertions and in a legal way. He should not be deprived of his entry without due process of law—that is, after due process in the courts. The entryman, during the period before he can prove up on his entry, does a great deal of labor which has a distinct monetary value, and expends certain sums in improvement. These things being done upon an implied agreement offered in the law should give him a property right or interest in the land, and, in case of dispute, be ascertained by the courts. To so protect him, I have, after five years of experience and upon consultation with experienced persons, introduced H. R. 18235, which reads as follows:

A bill (H. R. 18235) relating to entries on the public lands.

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the passage of this act it shall be unlawful for any executive or administrative officer of the Government of the United States to consider or use in connection with any order, finding, or decision to be entered, made, or rendered in any case relating to the rights of any person to enter or perfect title to any land entered under the public-land laws of the United States any report, letter, or other information submitted in writing, directly or indirectly, without first submitting to the person whose rights are affected a true and literal copy of said report, letter, or other information submitted in writing, and affording said person proper opportunity, at a hearing to be had, to disprove any charge so made injuriously affecting his or her rights, and at said hearing issues shall be joined upon the charge or charges made and evidence shall be confined strictly to the matter in issue.

SEC. 2. That every report hereafter submitted by any agent of the Government of the United States affecting the rights of any person to enter or perfect title to any public lands under any law relating to the disposition of the public lands of the United States shall state: First, those facts made of the agent's personal knowledge; second, those facts alleged upon information and belief; and all reports submitted by any such agent shall be signed by said agent and shall be of the same solemnity as though duly acknowledged by said agent under oath, and for any false report so submitted any such agent shall be proceeded against under chapter 6, section 125, of the Penal Code of the United States, approved March 4, 1909.

SEC. 3. That upon the entering of any final order or the rendition of any final decision by any executive or administrative officer involving the right of any person to enter or perfect title to any land of the United States, the aggrieved party shall have the right to appeal therefrom to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia or to the United States district court within whose territorial jurisdiction the land in controversy is situated within 90 days from the entering of said final order or rendition of said final decision, and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia and the United States district courts to hear and determine the right or rights of any such person or persons in any such case so appealed. Upon the filing of the appeal and a proper bond for costs, to be approved by the judge, in either of said courts, and the issuance of citation and evidence of service thereof upon the opposite party or parties, the clerk of said court shall so advise said executive or administrative officer from whose final finding or decision the appeal is taken, who shall thereupon cause to be forwarded to the said court the complete record in the case, and said cause shall then be heard upon the record so transmitted and the rights of the parties determined according to the law and equities of the case, with the right of appeal as in other cases provided by law: Provided, however, That whenever, in the opinion of the judge before whom the cause is pending, it is deemed necessary in the interests of justice to allow additional evidence to be offered, such evidence may be taken under such order or orders as may be entered by the court and shall become a part of the record in the case.

SEC. 4. That upon final judgment or decree being entered by a court in any such case said judgment or decree shall be certified by the clerk thereof to the Secretary of the Interior, who shall proceed in strict conformity therewith.

SEC. 5. That upon the submission of final proof upon any lands entered, it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to consider and determine the sufficiency of said proof within one year from the submission thereof, and upon his failure to so do the entryman may then apply to the United States court within whose jurisdiction the land is located, and upon the submission by the entryman of satisfactory evidence of his compliance with all the requirements of the law, the judge thereof shall enter a final order, judgment, or decree, adjudging or decreeing the entryman entitled to a patent to the land applied for from the Government of the United States, which said judgment or decree, unless appealed from as in other cases provided by law, shall become final within 60 days from the entering thereof, and upon certification thereof to the Secretary of the Interior shall be by him carried into effect.

This bill if enacted into law will give the entryman legal rights in place of what is now changeable executive discretion. It places the efforts of the settler and miner under the protection of the United States courts. The interpretation of the laws by the Department of the Interior is putting a ban upon settlement in many places.

We have become a great Nation. But in practically every mile of the advance of this greatness the settler has led the way. New York City was once a settlement; likewise Boston, Philadelphia, and Chicago, and so on around the glittering circle of mighty cities. The earliest settlers laid down the boundary of the present United States a few miles inland from the Atlantic Ocean; they and their immediate successors carried it westward to the summits of the Appalachians; a hardy band carried it down the broad fertile lands east of the Mississippi; again sturdy men in search of homes picked up the boundary of the United States and carried it across the river; thence westward they carried the hem of empire with their ox wagons to the Rocky Mountains; they sought and found gateways through them to the Golden West, and after 200 years of almost incredible heroism, toil, and suffering the eighth generation of settlers laid the border of our country down to stay along the sands of the Pacific Sea. They always carried with them law and liberty and love of country. We have been a Nation of settlers. It has been national policy, wise and sound, to promote their spread. We have made a mighty appeal to the landless but land-loving sturdy peoples of Europe by the offer of free homes, and they have responded by coming in millions to the immeasurable benefit of this country. Europe was inundated by barbarism; America overflowed by civilization. "Sons of pioneers" has always had a heroic ring. The estate of the settler was highly honorable.

But recently a change appears to have come over the spirit of the dream. The settler or miner now appears to be a person to be regarded askance. Mysterious espionage must attend his activities. He must be spoken of with the finger beside the nose and with elevated brow. When did the settler fall from his high estate? I have known them by the thousands, and as a body there are no more honorable, kindly, or industrious men and women. What has been the result of the unfavorable attitude of those clothed with practically arbitrary power? I submit below the report of Mr. John E. Jones, our consul general stationed at Winnipeg, as printed in the Daily Consular and Trade Reports for December 13, 1911, fourteenth year, No. 291. Attention is called to the large number of our citizens which are removing to Canada and the conditions prevailing there which induce them to go. I call the careful attention of the House to this report:

THE CANADIAN IMMIGRATION SYSTEM.

[From Consul General John E. Jones, Winnipeg.]

The work of handling the immigration movement into Canada has brought into existence a machine of somewhat complex and yet effective character, whose ramifications reach out all over the country from ocean to ocean. Last year over 311,000 immigrants came into the Dominion from all quarters, and this year the number will approximate closely 400,000, of whom at least 130,000 to 140,000 are from the United States.

Immigration is divided into three parts—British, foreign European immigration, and immigration from the United States. The organization dealing with the work, however, makes no distinction, though the conditions under which the people come renders the operation of the machine different in some respects. For instance, the immigrant from Great Britain does not lose his British citizenship, and starts from England with a cheap rate to Winnipeg and a 1-cent-a-mile rate to any point west of Winnipeg, whereas the ordinary rate is 3 cents per mile. The same conditions apply very largely to the Scandinavian and other immigrants.

THE AMERICAN HOMESTEADER—PREEMPTING METHOD.

Of the total immigration into the country, it is calculated that at least 50 per cent comes west of the Great Lakes, and among this is included almost the entire so-called American immigration. While the United States railways do not give any consideration, practically, to immigration to Canada, the Canadian railways have made arrangements whereby, on the presentation of a Canadian Landseekers' Association ticket order at the boundary line, the holder thereof is granted a rate of 1 cent per mile to inland destinations and 1 cent per mile back to the boundary, if it is his intention to return with a view to finally settling in Canada. These certificates are granted through the medium of the Canadian Government offices at St. Paul, Chicago, Kansas City, Detroit, Spokane, and elsewhere in the United States. The American homesteader having previously discussed his ultimate destination, either with the Government agents in the United States or with others, makes his way to the nearest Government land office, where he gets information of an accurate character as to the available homesteads for which he can make entry.

All over the West, particularly in the three Provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta, there are available about 200,000 homesteads. Each homestead has an area of 160 acres, and in some sections of the country a man may preempt an additional 160 acres by paying the Government $3 per acre for it, with the payments spread over 10 years.

In return for this homestead or homestead and preemption the settler pays $10 entry fee and undertakes to perform certain homestead duties, notably to reside on the homestead six months every year for three years, and cultivate the homestead to the extent of 15 acres every year for three years, and build upon the homestead a habitable house. The same duties are required, except residence, in the case of preemption; that is to say, in the preempted area he must also cultivate 15 acres every year. At the end of the three years, if the duties have been performed, the homesteader gets an absolute title to his property without further demand of any sort.

AID FOR ALL WORKERS.

In the case of a man coming in who is not prepared to take up land the Immigration Department finds him employment at agricultural work in almost any part of the country. He is registered on his arrival, and out of the hundreds of applications for help a place is selected for him; and, with a 1-cent-a-mile rate and a card of introduction, he is sent to the agent of the Government in the district in which he proposes to work, and by that agent is taken to the employer or employment to which he has been specifically sent.

Upon his arrival in the country, if he does not care to take up his quarters in a hotel, there are in Winnipeg and west of Winnipeg about 40 Government immigration buildings. In these halls he is at liberty to make his home during the period in which he is deciding as to his destination or arranging for employment. In these halls are provided heat, light, bedrooms, and bedding, and each man is entitled to two week's residence without cost; and if it is found that settlement has not been decided upon at the end of that time, and that the delay is in no way due to the settler himself, a further and indefinite period of residence in the hall is permitted.

CONTRACTS WITH EMPLOYERS.

The farmer, in his application for help, must state his nationality, the nationality of the man he wants, the kind of home he has, the area of the farm, the wages he is willing to pay, and the period of employment. The prospective employee is supplied with a duplicate copy of this application, and knows the conditions under which he takes service with the farmer. If a dispute arises between the employer and the employee, the new settler has recourse to the immigration department, where his case is taken up; and if it should appear that injustice has been done him, action is taken by the department in the interests of the new settler without delay.

In connection with each Government land office are a number of Government land guides, provided free by the department. These land guides, who are properly authenticated and possess a distinctive badge of office, are obtained through the Dominion land office of the district in which the settler proposes to locate. No charge is made for the land guides' services, though of course the new settler must pay the carriage transportation between the land office where he engages the livery and the locality upon which he decides to homestead.

EMERGENCIES PROVIDED FOR.

In case of sickness and, on that account, inability on the part of the new settler to perform the required duties, his homestead is protected—that is to say, an extension period is granted him by the department of the interior, so that, instead of performing all his duties in three years, he may be permitted four or five, as the case may be. In any event no advantage is taken of his sickness to deprive him of the homestead upon which he has placed his labor and perhaps his capital.

In case of sickness in his family and consequent destitution, due either to insufficient capital or to extra expenditure for medicines and medical help, the new homesteader has the right to appeal to the immigration department of the interior.

Inquiry is made into the situation, and if it is found that the settler, through no fault of his own, is lacking in food, fuel, or clothing, this is provided by the department and a lien taken upon the homestead for the amount advanced to the homesteader, with 6 per cent interest added. The homesteader understanding that he can not become possessed of his final title until he has met and liquidated all the advances of the Government. In cases where the homesteader has suffered partial or total failure of crop from hail, fire, or other untoward circumstances, and where he is still upon land for which he has not received his patent, the Department of the Interior will advance him a reasonable quantity of seed wheat and seed oats to enable him to get upon his feet again and proceed with his spring sowing. The amount of this grain, the actual cost of the grain itself plus transportation only, is made a charge upon the homesteader.

The department makes no charge for administration, the cost price of the grain and transportation only being a debt upon the homestead and payable before the patent is issued. In cases of prairie fire or in cases of prolonged sickness the Department of the Interior is always willing to help the homesteader to his feet again; and in very few instances indeed has the recipient failed to make proper payment of his indebtedness.

RETURN OF UNDESIRABLES—NO CHARGES FOR SERVICES.

In the case of persons who are undesirable, either through disease, criminal character, or insanity, such persons become the charge and care of the Department of the Interior, and are sent to their respective homes at departmental expense, after negotiations, of course, with the authorities of the country to which it is proposed to return these persons.

No charge is made by the Department of the Interior for service of any kind rendered to the immigrant. Where persons from another country have become destitute through sickness or lack of employment, in the cities, within a year after their arrival, the Department of the Interior either finds sufficient employment, or, in the case of sickness, food and medical comforts, for the destitute newcomer. The same conditions prevail in the country districts, except that the period during which the immigrant is a charge upon the Department of the Interior is three years, as against one year in the city and urban centers. Absolutely no distinction and no favoritism of any kind is shown in the disposition of homesteads. Any man of good character and sound mind, 21 years of age, is open to make entry for a homestead, and all homesteads are awarded strictly in the order of priority. In cases of the cancellation of a homestead—that is to say, when some one has failed to perform the duties required and has left the district—the right of entry on this canceled homestead is accorded first to the neighbors or the families of the neighbors, in preference to any outsider. In the case of aliens the oath of allegiance must be taken before the patent is granted.

ADVANCE PLANS FOR SCHOOLS.

Schools are provided in every district of the country where there are 10 or 12 children of school age to be found. In every township in western Canada two full sections of land have been set aside as an endowment for school lands. These sections, each constituting 640 acres, are sold to the highest bidder, and the proceeds are an endowment to the school that is yet to be.

All land, by whomsoever owned, immediately upon ownership is liable to a school tax, though this does not apply to police or general taxation. No property owner, however, can escape the school tax, which becomes operative the moment the transfer of the property takes place. Persons adjacent to Crown timber have permission to cut all the timber they require for home building, fuel, or fence building upon receipt of a permit, for which a nominal charge of 25 cents is made by the land agent or subland agent of the district.

I have no complaint to make of our sister to the north. She is entitled to the results of the wisdom of her policy and the justice of her actions. But we can not afford to lose these people while millions of acres of as fertile land as we have are awaiting agricultural development in this country. While the demand for subsistence of our own people is evidenced by rising prices, where is the wisdom of the policy that stays the hands which fill the horn of plenty every harvest time, while hungry men, women, and children regard its stinting with distress? A family on every 100 acres of tillable land is a wise policy. As a commentary on this loss of settlers to Canada and the unsatisfactory treatment of settlers in the United States, the total area of land entered during the year ending June 30, 1911, was 8,752,169.55 acres less than for the preceding year, a decrease of 33 per cent in a single year.

Also it appears that from July 1, 1910, to July 1, 1911, 90,768 citizens went from the United States to Canada and only 49,080 from all other countries; and from July 1, 1911, to December 1, 1911, five months, 40,085 American citizens and only 18,499 aliens went to Canada. (Statement of Senator GALLINGER, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 1012, this session.)

One source of distress to the entryman has been in the allowing of too many contests. I know of entries against which three or four contests were admitted. The cost to the entryman in defending his entry becomes a burden greater than many poor men can afford, and they are driven from the land when they were without fault. A court could determine by the facts, ascertained from witnesses, whether the entryman's residence, cultivation, and improvements were sufficient, and these facts once so determined would protect the entryman in his rights.

The practice has been to allow anyone who so desired to file a contest against any entryman. Where the entryman is not complying with the law in good faith, a contestant may render a public service. But it seems to me that the statements made by contestants, no matter how sincere in intent, should be most carefully scrutinized. The contestant is interested in the cancellation of the entry; and in many cases the value involved will prove a serious temptation. He finds an entryman on a piece of land, with good and substantial improvements. There are a house, a barn, outbuildings, fences, and cleared and cultivated land. The place begins to look like a home. If he can cause the cancellation of the entry he will become the possessor by preference right of the results of another man's industry, enterprise, and sacrifice without compensation to him and with little cost to himself for contest proceedings. He will have an improved entry, with roads or trails thereto, and the matter of complying with the law will be much easier for him. My experience has been that in many instances the statements of contestants against original entrymen have not been so scrupulously examined as they should have been; and I know of instances where contestants of some means have by repeated contests broken up a poor settler and compelled him to abandon his entry, being unable to bear the burden of expense involved in defending his entry.

I do not wish to be understood as opposing all contests. A contestant who files contest affidavit against a man who purposes to defraud the Government renders a public service. My contention is that they ought to be allowed only upon good and sufficient cause, and when it clearly appears that the purpose is not merely to harass the entryman in the hope that he will be forced or induced to abandon his entry.

If an entryman knew that his acts might subsequently be reviewed by a court which had power to summon witnesses; that the witnesses as well as himself would be subjected to skillful cross-examination; that false statements for or against him would be promptly and severely punished; if he knew the greatest strength his case could have would lie in his industry and good faith in complying with the law, I believe there would be little or no inclination or attempt to perpetrate fraud upon the Government. He would also know that every statement against him would be subject to the same analysis and penalties, and that no secret report or unsigned paper or secret verbal report would have any consideration. He would not be subjected to the necessity of submitting his proof and his case to find it stated later that he had failed at some time to answer charges made against his entry—charges that he was never informed of and never expected to have been made, but which were contained in secret reports. Many a settler has lost his entry upon secret charges and never found out why he was ruled against. This statement is based upon the numerous complaints made to me by entrymen and their attorneys during the past five years—people whom I know and believe to be worthy of credence.

Why should there be secret information? All information is either true or false, in whole or in part, and the measure of its truth or falsity is susceptible of proof. If the secret information is not true, the Government ought not to take advantage of it; and if true, it would lose none of its efficacy by being made known. Suppose a trial were being held in a court, and after all the evidence was supposed to be in, the plaintiff should declare that he had some secret evidence; that thereupon the defendant and all in his interest should be ordered to withdraw and the court should in secret session hear this secret evidence and decide the case upon it and declare its decision, stating that it was based upon the secret and undisclosable evidence. Such a procedure would not last a single hour among a free people. Yet settlers must submit to it. Are men who desire to settle upon the public lands of such a peculiar class that their every act must be viewed with suspicion, that they must be surrounded with secret inspection, and matters in which they are vitally interested decided in a secret court, from which no appeal can be had to the open-air courts, established to secure justice for high and low, and from which they alone are excluded? Such treatment of a worthy body of our citizenship is out of place in the twentieth century. The system is both wrong and unnecessary.

I do not know what proportion of entries on the public lands are fraudulent entries and, under the present imperfect system of deciding upon the merits of an entryman's claim, I do not think anyone knows or can know the amount of fraud by or against the entryman. I confidently believe that many who are justly entitled to their lands are driven from them. During several years of experience in representing a part of a public-land State I have been appealed to by a large number of settlers who were having trouble in securing patents. I have advised them in the submission of additional proofs, ascertaining, where possible, the exact nature of the charges against the entry, so that if they had a good case they could meet the charges with valid proof. Many have received patents. Others, it seemed to me, would have won in a court of law. I wish to pause long enough to say that I am not making an attack upon the public officials who deal with business relating to the public lands. If it were in place, I might say some pleasant words. Our relations are cordial. My disagreement is with a system, or policy, which I do not believe continually secures justice, nor do I see how it can. I believe an appeal to the courts is absolutely indispensable. I recall a case which was passed to patent after some eight or nine years' delay, during which time the entry had several times been ordered canceled; if renewed and repeated efforts had not prevented such action, the entryman would have been deprived of the land, finally justly decided to be his. I could enumerate a long list of such cases. There was a man whose patent was secured after efforts similar to those above described, while two poorer neighbors, wearied and discouraged after years of waiting, failed to apply for aid and their entries were canceled; all of these cases were equally meritorious.

Secretary Fisher, at Boise, Idaho, on September 18, 1911, in a speech made the following statement:

Here we find that a man comes on the land, puts his money into necessary buildings, a house and outbuildings and sheds, and buys implements, then starts to clear his land. He comes in good faith, meaning to do everything the Government asks of him, and he works ahead, and pretty soon his money is all gone and he is up against it hard. There is no mercy for him. He faces ruin and the loss of everything. His hard years of toil and effort and sacrifices and isolation and struggle have netted him what? Nothing! Tell me that is right? Tell me that is just? I say, no! It is wrong—dead wrong—and the fact that the United States Government does it and allows this sort of thing to go on, knowing the terrible injustice of it, makes no difference to me. I have come that far to the western view.

These words seem worthy of universal application.

When the final proofs have been passed upon by the local land officials they are forwarded to the General Land Office in Washington. Here examination is made, and such action upon the entries is recommended by some subordinate as his judgment may determine. The cases in the first instance and upon appeal are thus apparently prepared. I have never been able to satisfy myself as to what extent the higher officials make original and independent examination of the merits of an entry, especially in cases upon appeal where their superior judgment should be exercised. Official correspondence in such cases is much initialed, apparently indicating its preparation by some subordinate; and in cases upon appeal possibly and probably by the same person who originally passed upon it adversely, and who will naturally have a pride of opinion in seeing his former action sustained.

Frequently certain reports from special agents or others are regarded as secret, and neither the entryman nor anyone in his behalf is allowed to examine them. What they contain of fact or error can not be determined. They appear to be treated as of more value than the known and sworn evidence of competent witnesses. In presenting his evidence where secret reports are concerned the entryman makes his statements as it were in the dark. How can he answer an unknown charge, especially a charge he never expected anyone to make because not in accord with the facts as he knows them? A Member of this House told me the life history of one of these secret papers. An entryman was denied patent, and the refusal was said to be justified by a secret report. After many months of endeavor, the Member succeeded in inducing a high official to personally examine this secret paper. It was opened. It was found to contain an immaterial statement and was unsigned.

The high official was dumbfounded. The entry was passed to patent. All proceedings in court are open to the light of day. Secret papers and secret evidence are unknown. Every material allegation must be proved in open court. Every witness may be cross-examined and every statement sifted to find the exact amount of information possessed by the witness, his ability to acquire information, to understand what he sees, and his accuracy and sincerity in relating it. False statements by either side would be promptly and severely punished.

Before a court no witness is given special credence by reason of any special service he may be in. Every witness must submit what he knows, how he knows it, and his credibility upon cross-examination may be attacked. A court would examine into the facts, would ascertain from witnesses what the settler had actually done, would admit no secret papers, would give no special credit to any special agent testifying either for the one side or the other, and it would decide the case upon the preponderance of the evidence and on the merits.

During a speech by Senator BORAH in the Senate on January 19, 1912, the following statements were made:

MR. BORAH. That is true. You can imagine the difficulty which confronts the homesteader when that happens. In the first place, the chances are all to the effect that he has not the means to enter into litigation.

The second proposition is that he must litigate the Government of the United States. The representatives of the Government of the United States are the protestants. The result is, as the Senator from North Dakota has said, that they, in a great many instances, after these five years of residence and effort, abandon at the last moment the hope of getting a home, because it is discouraging enough indeed when you go into a court to contest a proposition when the court is the contestant; and the homesteader has learned that there are a great many chances to take in that kind of litigation.

Moreover, Mr. President, we have up here somewhere, or did have, in the Interior Department, something that I will venture no other Government in the world has, or if it has it has been criticized for it in many different ways. We have what we call a secret-service department. When these special agents go into the Interior Department with their facts, they are sent into division A or B, or whatever they call it, and there is not power enough in the United States to get those facts out of that division.

MR. HEYBURN. Alleged facts.
MR. BORAH. But the homesteader never knows the facts, or alleged facts, upon which his title may be canceled, and he can not get them. I denounce such a system as un-American, tyrannical, brutal. It ought to damn any system that will sustain it. I believe in an open fight in every avenue of life, and I here and now charge upon my Government this cowardly and infamous system which has been rejected years ago by all just and fair-minded people. There is no place in this Government for star-chamber proceedings, no place for secrecy as against a man's contested right. It is vicious.

MR. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President—
THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

MR. BORAH. I yield.
MR. CLARK of Wyoming. After these facts have been passed upon by the Department of the Interior, there is no court on the face of the earth that has jurisdiction to determine whether or not the decision of the Department of the Interior is a true decision, and the homesteader is left absolutely helpless. The only man under the flag of the United States who can not have his day in the courts of his country to determine his rights is the man seeking to avail himself of the land laws.

By reason of his employment by the Government a man has no access of judgment, honesty, or wisdom. He is no better in his public capacity than he was in his private station, and no wiser; his statements are no more worthy of credence or trust than before or than the statements of any good citizen who is informed upon the matter. I have confidence in the citizens of the United States. An honest man is always under oath. A man to be a special agent to examine entries upon the public lands ought to be a man who knows not only the land laws of the United States, but is also well informed as to the difficulties settlers experience in making homes in any particular locality where he is making examinations. Special agents frequently are not adequately prepared for the work assigned to them. It is not sufficient to come casually into a settlement and in a few hours think himself able to make a report; and in no case ought a report to be made upon the statements of others unless such persons are well known to be entirely honest and disinterested, and the report should state upon whose information it is made. I am inclined to believe too much importance is attached to the statements of special agents and too little to other evidence.

If I were a special agent and ordered to examine certain entries, I would go to the locality, examine the general topography of the country, the nature of the growths on the land, its distance from market or older settlements, the original difficulty of obtaining access to the lands settled upon, the trails to be made, roads to be built, the resources of each settler, his ability to buy animals and tools, to employ assistance in clearing and improving the land, his physical ability, his industry, and his experience. I would examine each entry to ascertain what peculiar difficulties were met with in establishing a home thereon. I would inspect his buildings and see what labor and capital were necessary in preparing the materials and transporting them to the place of use; his fences in the same way; and his cultivated land, to be sure what amount of labor the preparation of the land involved. I would be inclined to expect more of a strong man than of a weaker one; of a man with some means than of one with none. Good faith is as clearly shown when a poor man of small physical strength does his best diligently as when a stronger man of some means does more. These things I would consider elementary. I would make my report in such a way as to clearly show all these things and with the expectation that the entryman and his neighbors would, as they ought to, have full knowledge of what I had reported.

I most earnestly dissent from any suggestion that persons who make entries on the public domain are to be regarded as being engaged in a suspicious occupation, whose every action is to be viewed with distrust. While the entries are made in the public-land States, the entrymen come from all parts of the country, and in defending their good name and purposes I am no more defending my own people than I am those of practically every other State.

It is reported that in the year ended June 30, 1911, special agents personally examined and reported on 26,505 entries, of which reports 16,483 were favorable and 10,022 were adverse. In my opinion if the entrymen had had the right to have had their entries examined in a court upon the questions of compliance with the law and of good faith a very considerable number of those whose entries were adversely reported would have been found justly entitled to their lands; and in every case where the true facts were not as reported by the agent and where such persons lost their lands the result was a miscarriage of justice. It is shown that the adverse reports were 62 per cent of the favorable reports, a percentage entirely too high, in my judgment, to represent the real condition of the entries reported upon. Reporting an entry adversely may present the appearance of great care and diligence on the part of the agent, but anything that is wrong is wrong. No one ought to endeavor to make a showing at the expense of the rights of some one else or of public justice.

The following table is part of the table given in the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office for 1911, page 64, so far as it relates to homestead entries where fraud was alleged:

Homesteads.	Pending June 30, 1910.	Received during year.	Approved.	Cancelled.	Otherwise disposed of.	Total.	Pending June 30, 1911.
Original.....	14,940	8,427	3,431	3,096	6,527	16,840
Finals.....	257	5,887	2,629	58	542	3,229	2,915
Cash.....	482	2,953	2,864	74	436	3,374	61
Total.....	15,679	17,267	5,493	3,563	4,074	13,120	19,816

This shows that the cancellations were nearly 65 per cent of the number approved for patenting, and I can not believe that this percentage shows the real condition as it would have appeared had the entrymen had the opportunity of defending their rights in a court.

During the past fiscal year there were 52,076 patents issued upon homestead entries. During the same period more than 7,000 cases were before the General Land Office upon appeal, of which some 4,200 were finally disposed of, no appeal apparently having been taken to the Secretary of the Interior. Of the remainder some 2,800 were apparently appealed. It would be most interesting to know in how many of these cases the ordinary courts of the United States would have concurred in the final award as given under the present system. I desire to call attention to the following statement made by the Commissioner of the General Land Office in his current report:

As it exists, the General Land Office, under an organization originally intended and equipped for executive duties alone, is required to perform judicial duties not often imposed upon a court of special jurisdiction.

This court, subject to appeal to the Secretary of the Interior, decides cases involving in the aggregate immense values, and there is no appeal to courts of higher jurisdiction upon questions of law or of the sufficiency of the evidence upon which the case is decided, and no adequate provision for determining the competency, relevancy, or material nature of the facts alleged by the usual legal tests.

I have in mind a case which will illustrate what the difficulties are in the way of the settler. A man entered a tract of land and in due time made final proof. Patent not being issued within what appeared to be a reasonable time, inquiry was made. It was stated in reply that a special agent had reported adversely. After some considerable time and trouble, the nature of the charges were, in this case, ascertained and evidence was submitted to overcome them. Again charges were made and evidence in refutation submitted. This was repeated several times. Finally, every possible charge having been made that seemed possible to submit, and the entryman having proved his case so clearly, the land was admitted to patent, after 10 or 11 years of contention. This entryman was fortunate in being able to discover what the charges were, but had they been held as secret as occurs in many instances, he would have undoubtedly lost his land.

An entryman in such a case ought to have the right to prove his case in open court, and the courts ought to be open to him. I have no plea to make for the man who would defraud the Government. My plea is for the man who is trying to do right and that he should have an American's right of his day in the established courts. My objection is to a system or policy which has grown up under the administration of the land laws. I urge a change in the laws to provide more equitable conditions. I have in mind no official or special agent, with the desire to visit punishment upon any person. I believe the present system does not accomplish the ends of justice and that a new system which will ought to take its place.

There is another matter that is the cause of serious complaint. It is frequently alleged by entrymen that after a date has been fixed for a hearing upon an entry and the entryman has appeared with his witnesses at considerable expense a special agent will have the hearing postponed to a later date. In the event that a postponement is ever necessary due and ample notice of it should be given the entryman. If it were necessary, I could multiply such instances, as I believe could be done by every Member of this House from a public-land State.

There is a question akin to this in so far as it relates to the opportunity to develop the natural resources of the public-land States, and especially in the matter of agriculture. In my judgment the agricultural lands in the national forests ought to be listed, preferably by a commission of men expert on all questions involved in such work. The listing should begin with the lands more easily accessible and for which there is an actual present demand on the part of settlers. All the Representatives from the States in which there are national forests are continually in receipt of inquiries from intending settlers, stating that they desire to homestead certain areas within the national forests and that they are refused the right by forest officials. In some instances within my knowledge I believe the settlers were right in their contention that the lands were agricultural. Such lands are under the law to be open to settlement.

It seems to me that it would be a great relief to the Forest Service to have the lands listed by a commission. It would also greatly facilitate settlement upon the lands, as intending homesteaders would know where the lands that were open to homestead entry were located, and that they could get patent in the usual way. It is a serious handicap to settlement where settlers are left in doubt as to the final outcome of their entries. All homestead and mining business ought to be conducted by one office, that of the Department of the Interior, and the Forest Service relieved of this burden, a burden outside of the care and protection of the forests. There are within the national forests some 163,000,000 acres of land, excluding areas in Alaska, many millions of acres of which are suitable for agriculture.

In the matter of secret reports the following official communications are of interest. The news article erred in supposing that my bill was the result of Forester Graves's testimony. I have already explained that it antedated his testimony and have so informed the distinguished Forester. It is to be noted that the reports made by forest officers are not kept secret at their request. They are willing for the contents to be known and the statements examined. The secret reports generally referred to in these remarks are reports by special agents.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
FOREST SERVICE,
Washington, January 6, 1912.

Hon. W. C. HAWLEY,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: There has come to my notice an article in the Tacoma (Wash.) Ledger of December 19, 1911, apparently due to my testimony while recently before the House Committee on Agriculture with reference to reports made by forest officers on claims, and which article states that "in consequence" of that testimony you "would introduce a bill requiring that all reports of this character be made public."

I have lately looked over the official report of my testimony, and I see that I was not as clear as I intended to be in making plain the facts and situation in regard to reports that are made by forest officers on claims.

Forest officers do not go upon lands outside national forests to report on settlement claims. There may have been a few instances some years ago where claims outside and adjacent to national forests were examined and reported upon by the Forest Service, on the request of the Land Department, in a spirit of comity, but that practice was abandoned long ago, and I know of no such cases now. In fact, there is no such practice existing. When a forest officer receives a notice of final proof on a claim from a register and receiver he has been expressly instructed to return the notice to the register, indorsed that the claim is outside the national forest and no report will be made, as the Forest Service has no jurisdiction. However, at the instance and special request of the General Land Office, forest officers are permitted, upon request of the Chief of Field Division or a special agent of the General Land Office made to any one of them for information in respect to a claim adjacent to a national forest, to give such officers any information or facts incidentally within his knowledge or possession regarding a claim, but no examination and report on the claim is to be made by the forest officer on any such request to him, since no authority exists for the Forest Service to expend any part of its appropriation for such reports.

A proposition by a Chief of Field Division that forest officers might indorse information possessed by them on the back of final-proof notices returned by them to registers on claims outside national forests, with an expression of opinion on the bona fides of the claim, has been refused.

As regards the confidential character of reports, it was at first the practice of the Forest Service not to treat reports on claims as confidential until it was expressly requested so to do by the General Land Office, since it was the practice of that office to treat the reports of its special agents as confidential and it was so treating the reports of the Forest Service on claims when received by it. If the Forest Service made known the report, it would be in conflict with a long-established rule of the Land Department. While, so far as national-forest interests alone are concerned, there is no reason to treat Forest Service reports as confidential, yet since the General Land Office is charged with the prosecution of alleged illegal claims, if it asks that a report be regarded as confidential, it would seem that the Forest Service should comply. It may be supposed that to give publicity to a report might in some way embarrass the Land Department in advance of its readiness for trial in a case.

In view of the newspaper article referred to and its statement of a purpose by you to introduce a bill founded on my testimony before the committee, I have felt you should know the precise situation in the Forest Service as to reporting on claims, and I hope that my statement above will be found satisfactory.

Very truly, yours,

H. S. GRAVES, Forster.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
FOREST SERVICE,
SISKIYOU NATIONAL FOREST,
Grants Pass, Oreg., December 13, 1911.

N. C. DIVELBISS,
Port Orford, Oreg.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of December 2 is received.

I regret that it is not possible for me to comply with your request for a copy of Ranger Milbury's report on your mineral application No. 06872. Reports of this nature are made at the request of the General Land Office, and are entirely confidential in nature, so far as the Forest Service is concerned. The question of allowing the public to see or obtain any copy of such a report therefore lies entirely with the General Land Office.

Very truly, yours,

R. L. FROMME,
Forest Supervisor.

On January 19, 1912, Senator BORAH delivered an able speech in the Senate, during which both he and other Senators made statements very material to the subject matter of this discussion, and I desire to add some of them to these remarks.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. My criticism goes to the employment of men who are not needed. I rebel against the idea that every man who undertakes to get land from the Government is dishonest. It is a shameful charge, and the Acting Attorney General of the United States acknowledged but a few days ago in a formal opinion over his own signature dismissing a case, that he had been misled by the "field officers" of the Government into a prosecution that was not justifiable. I quote:

"You are hereby directed to dismiss the three suits in equity for the prosecution of which you were heretofore specially retained by me."

In three cases that arose over certain lands in Arizona, said the Attorney General to the special assistant in Arizona:

"To explain: This litigation was the direct result of a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, dated August 23, 1909, strongly representing upon the faith of certain reports made by field officials of the General Land Office that the patents had been procured by grossly fraudulent misrepresentation of material facts, particularly in regard to the discovery of mineral in place within the various locations."

"After due investigation and consideration the Secretary, by his letter of August 23, 1911, a copy of which I send herewith for your further information, advises in effect that no further effort can consistently or properly be made to maintain the litigation."

"The charge that the land was in part acquired to be sold and used as town lots and to be used for grazing purposes seems wholly unsupported."

"Evidently the request which led to the institution of these suits was due to an oversight by subordinate officials of the Land Department. The nature of the case as it stood before that department at the time when the patents issued could not have been known to the Secretary of the Interior when he made that request, and was not known to this department."

"It is a matter of sincere regret to me that the Government should have been placed in the position of accusing of dishonesty and fraud persons whose conduct, for aught that appears, was above reproach."

There are too many overambitious and meddlesome employees of this department who feel it necessary to base serious charges on idle rumor.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, in conclusion I urge that our public-land laws are antiquated and out of date, impracticable, harsh, and sometimes cruel in their operation. They discourage bona fide settlers. They have practically driven from our public domain the man of limited means, the man whose peculiar province it ought to be the duty of the land laws to serve. They have, as I have shown by the figures submitted, driven thousands and thousands of our best settlers and citizens into expatriation. They leave the homesteader at the time he acquires title, if he ever does, stripped, impoverished, discouraged, and ready to sell at a sacrifice that which he has so dearly bought by his efforts and which he intended as his home. These laws do not help the Government; they retard the development of the community, and they are unfair and unjust in their operation toward the individual settlers.

Mr. HAYBURN. Mr. President, if I may trespass upon the courtesy of my colleague, the law requires that the settler shall receive his patent at the expiration of the term. I am in sympathy with the Senator's bill, and shall support it, to reduce the time. The complaint to-day, based upon the incidents recited, is properly directed not to the law, because there is no law that postpones the delivery of the patent or authorizes it for an hour, but the difficulties we contend with are rules and regulations that are in violation of the law, of the right of the settler under the law. There is no law authorizing the inspection after the performance of the duty of the entryman at the land office. There is no law authorizing the sending of a special agent to ferret out and play detective upon the acts of the settler. There is not a word in the statute that authorizes it. There is no law that authorizes any steps to be taken by the Interior Department after the final proof at the land office, except upon irregularities appearing upon the face of the papers.

Mr. BORAH. Now, I do not propose to go into the question of the exact facts as to whether they had complied in all particular instances with the homestead law or not; I have my own view of the matter. I think they were there in good faith and intended to make homes; but, whether they had actually complied with the law in all particulars or not, one thing is certain—that it ought not to have taken the Government of the United States six or eight years to determine against a single homesteader whether or not he has a valid title. It is proof conclusive to anyone who watches the proposition that if they can not cancel it upon facts they simply destroy them by the long time in which they engage them in litigation.

Mr. DIXON. I have been much interested in what the Senator from Idaho has said. It has been my experience, however, that the great delay and drag and irritation has come from the administration of the land laws rather than from the land laws themselves. I have a letter on my desk, not over 10 days old, relating to a case where I personally know the conditions, in which five homesteaders in the county where I lived had lived there 15 years before the lands were surveyed. One of them is a member of the board of county commissioners of my county.

Three years ago he made final proof on his homestead, but the patent has been withheld on account of a desire for the classification for a power site. Three years ago last summer I induced the chief of the division—the Hydrographic Division, I presume—to visit these lands personally and make a report. These three years have dragged, and still the patents do not issue. Cases of that kind create more irritation in my State than the laws now on the books.

A year ago last June they withdrew from entry over 20,000,000 acres in Montana, either homestead or desert, and classified it for coal. Eighteen months have passed and not an acre of the 20,000,000 has yet been classified, and the settlers are waiting and waiting and becoming more poverty stricken every day, because they do not know what the final result is going to be. I think four-fifths lie in the administration of the present laws.

I am wholly in sympathy with the three-years bill that the Senator has introduced, but I can not overlook my own belief that it is the red tape and the continuation of the red-tape administration in the Department of the Interior that could be cut without any further legislation.

Mr. BORAH. I now yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I was going to make a suggestion along the line of the remarks made by the Senator from Montana.

My recollection is that we now have upon the books, put there, I think, at the instance of the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], laws providing that when a man has complied with the terms of the law and his hearing has been held and no fraud has been alleged his patent shall issue. I think we have that in distinct, plain terms, and yet in the administration of the law the patent does not issue.

For instance, I can cite a case within my personal observation in the last 30 days, where the man has lived upon his land for 5 years. There is no question as to his good faith. There is no question as to his raising agricultural products. There is no question but that the man and the land were both right for entry under the homestead law. The final receipt has issued at the local land office. The patent has not been issued.

Inquiry is made at the General Land Office at the end of two years—two years, mind you—while the settler stands waiting there, hoping he can realize something, either by borrowing money or getting credit. It is there found that notwithstanding the fact that the law has been fully complied with, the patent is still held up awaiting investigation by certain bureaus as to whether or not the land is valuable for other purposes, the last one awaiting the investigation of the Geological Bureau whether or not there is a water-power site upon the land; and when the question is asked of the head of the bureau, "What difference does it make whether there are water-power sites upon the land or not; suppose your Geological Survey finds there is a water-power site, what then?" they reply, "Then, eventually, the man must get his patent whether there is a power site there or not."

It simply means delay, delay, and delay.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the Senator from Idaho permit me?

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator has indicated in his discussion so far that he would close with the subject that he has now under consideration. I want to suggest to him that he has so far omitted a most important feature in the matter of the administration of our laws.

Congress is to blame in one respect. Congress is employing to-day a corps of people known as special agents, but whose general duties seem to be those of detectives, for the purpose of arresting every possible farmer in the country who is upon public land. These men are employed with the idea that has been very prevalent of late that every man who is upon a homestead is necessarily there because he wants to steal it from the Government without paying a proper price. Assuming that to be the case, we have assisted the departments in furnishing them with a great army of detectives who feel that they can not earn their salaries unless they do it at the expense of the man who is on the farm and upon Government land in attempting to show that he is trying to steal his land.

Further than that, if the Senator will pardon me one moment, we have gone so far in the administration that instead of allowing the claimant upon public land to make his proof before the register and receiver of the land office, as in the old way, we have a fixed date on which he can have his hearing, and that date must be fixed to agree with the convenience of the detective who is there and must investigate whether or not he has any right. Then the detective goes there, and he has the right, and the administration accorded him that right, to hold it up for further consideration. So his proof has been held up from year to year at the suggestion of a detective employed for the purpose of disturbing him, until he has become so discouraged about getting his title that in many cases he has been compelled to leave it. In that respect the Congress of the United States is very much at fault.

Mr. BORAH. I agree with the views of the Senator, so well stated. I remember upon one occasion, where there was a contest over a homestead title, to have seen seven special agents in one town waiting upon the trial, to watch a homesteader who did not have money enough to pay an attorney $5 to take the evidence before the land office.

But I think there is a little daylight upon the subject. I am looking forward to an entirely different administration. I stated there had been a disposition to return to the revenue basis, and this, in my judgment, which has been suggested by the Senator, is one of the evidences of it. I am of the opinion the regulation has been abandoned now—at least, I have not seen the effects of it so much of late—but there was a time when the homesteader would go into the public-land office and make his proof. The next day, after the homesteader had gone his way, assuming that the representatives of the Government had all that they desired to have and he had made the complete proof, the special agent would come along, without any facts or knowledge in his possession whatever of any defect upon the part of the title, and he would simply file a contest or a protest in the hope that there might be something he could find in after years.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to suggest to my colleague that in addition to that they withhold from the person seeking to enter land the grounds of the protest, and that is unpardonable.

Mr. BORAH. That is true. You can imagine the difficulty which confronts the homesteader when that happens. In the first place, the chances are all to the effect that he has not the means to enter into litigation.

The second proposition is that he must litigate the Government of the United States. The representatives of the Government of the United States are the protestants. The result is, as the Senator from North Dakota has said, that they, in a great many instances, after these five years of residence and effort, abandon at the last moment the hope of getting a home, because it is discouraging enough indeed when you go into a court to contest a proposition when the court is the contestant; and the homesteader has learned that there are a great many chances to take in that kind of litigation.

Moreover, Mr. President, we have up here somewhere, or did have, in the Interior Department, something that I will venture no other Government in the world has, or if it has it has been criticized for it in many different ways. We have what we call a secret-service department. When these special agents go into the Interior Department with their facts, they are sent into division A or B, or whatever they call it, and there is not power enough in the United States to get those facts out of that division.

Mr. HEYBURN. Alleged facts.

Mr. BORAH. But the homesteader never knows the facts, or alleged facts, upon which his title may be canceled, and he can not get them. I denounce such a system as un-American, tyrannical, brutal. It ought to damn any system that will sustain it. I believe in an open fight in every avenue of life, and I here and now charge upon my Government this cowardly and infamous system which has been rejected years ago by all just and fair-minded people. There is no place in this Government for star-chamber proceedings, no place for secrecy as against a man's contested right. It is vicious.

Speaking especially for the State I have the honor to represent, let me present the difficulties we experience from the standpoint of legislation and administration in the matter of our internal development. The State of Oregon has some 61,000,000 acres of surface area; of this amount, 16,000,000 acres are included in the national forests. Immense areas in addition are included in various forms of reservations and withdrawals. This materially diminishes our opportunities for development, and makes our plea for favorable conditions to develop what is left all the stronger. The exclusions of the millions of acres above referred to are for the benefit of the Nation at large, as against the benefit of the State of Oregon, or at least not for its special interest. I earnestly urge, therefore, that all the lands which remain, not excluded from use by the laws or by administrative policy, and which are open to settlement and development under the law, should not be hedged about with restrictions that impair their use according to law. In these remarks it will be observed that I am dealing with the lands that are legally intended to be developed by agriculture and mining especially. My remarks apply to the areas that are open under the law. I am asking legislation to make secure in their rights the settlers and miners who are devoting their days of toil to the development of unused resources. There is no intention expressed in the law that lands valuable for agriculture and mining should not be so used; rather it is expressly provided that they shall be open to the settler and miner. But in the administration of the laws a policy has been followed which has greatly restricted their use. I believe this was not the intention of the laws. I believe that no man's right should be left undefined and unprotected. The bill I am advocating is reasonable, and follows the practice immemorially exercised in this country in protecting the rights of our citizens by extending the protection of the courts to the settler and miner. Our lands have rich soils and valuable minerals. The lands which have passed into private ownership are being profitably used. We wish to extend this beneficial use to other lands, which the law expressly provides may be so used, and in strict conformity to the law.

I do not believe the excellent and enterprising citizenship of Oregon needs any eulogy at this time; their material advance is eloquently set forth in the facts and figures of the recent census. One matter, however, not included in the census reports I think well worthy of the attention of the House. The people of the State of Oregon and of its several localities have inaugurated a policy in the matter of river and harbor improvement that seems to me notable and commendable and which will meet the approval of the Congress of the United States, as well as with cordial and generous cooperation. The legislature at its session in 1909 enacted a port act, which authorizes the people of any locality having a waterway within it to create a port commission and to issue bonds and levy taxes, with the proceeds of which to make improvements on the waterway in which they are interested. The legislature has also appropriated $300,000 to be used in cooperation with the Government in the construction of free locks at Oregon City, on the Willamette River. Under the port act several ports have been created and others will be. Those now in existence are the ports of Coos Bay, Tillamook, Siuslaw, Bay City, Bay Ocean, Myrtle Point, Nehalem, and Port Orford. These ports have raised or will raise for the improvement of the waterways in which they are interested, for expenditure in cooperation with the General Government, about $1,500,000, to which should be added the $300,000 above referred to, making a total contribution of some $1,800,000. This sum will be materially increased later. No greater evidence of good faith, of enterprise, or the necessity for the improvements could be given. The improvements are to meet the needs of present commerce, and to provide for future growth. These communities are largely dependent, as is the rest of the State, upon the development of the sustaining or surrounding country. No State can attain its destined greatness, nor her people that place in the world to which they are entitled, if its several communities are to be segregated by large areas of unused lands.

With malice toward none, but with a fervent hope that the remedy desired to cure the evils of an imperfect system may be provided, I appeal to the representatives of a justice-loving people. The interests of the whole Nation are injured and the growth and development of nearly a third of our superficial area is retarded. The West is a famous and deserving land peopled with a worthy people. The burden we bear is too great a hindrance. Millions of acres are permanently withdrawn to form forests for the entire United States. Their imperial extent is a serious handicap. But there are lands which it is intended by the laws as an expression of the public will shall be ours to develop for the common good and for our own aggrandizement as a people. Unimagined riches of mine and soil are everywhere. Shall they be to us the waters of Tantalus? The glories and achievement of our beautiful States will be a common heritage. We greatly need the work of the settler which has been the basis upon which the other and older States have arisen to power and affluence. We have not been idle. We have the spirit of enterprise. The only limit to our growth will be a restraining hand forbidding the legitimate and legal use of the vast resources with which a bountiful nature has abundantly provided us. The bill to which I have called your attention is a reasonable measure. It will effectively remedy the adverse conditions under which we suffer. It will recall our citizens to our own lands and encourage a new era in settlement. Vast areas will be reduced to profitable use. For the reason of the good I confidently believe it will do I intend to urge its passage. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, how much time has the gentleman from Oregon consumed?

The CHAIRMAN. Thirty-one minutes.

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LINDBERGH].

[Mr. LINDBERGH addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH].

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I wish to invite the attention of the committee to the items in the Agricultural appropriation bill which have to do especially with protection of our national forests against destruction by fire.

The items of the present bill reduce the appropriations for improvement work $250,000 and cut $800,000 from the special fund set aside for use in fire prevention in case of emergency. Last year $1,000,000 was set apart to be used by the Forestry Department in fighting forest fires in cases of extraordinary emergency. This year the bill sets apart $200,000.

I want to direct the attention of the committee to the importance of fire protection, and in doing so I do not propose to discuss the merits of various features of the forest-reserve policy or of its administration. I am aware that the Members of this House have different opinions upon this great subject. I am aware that there are those in our country who believe in more of State power in the handling of our forestry question. There are those who believe that large areas of land now included in forest reserves should be excluded and opened to settlement. There are those, again, who believe that the present policy of Forestry Service should be continued, and that the hands of the Federal Government should be sustained and strengthened in carrying out this policy.

I do not propose to discuss the merits or demerits of any of these questions, but rather want to call the attention of the Congress to the importance of protecting our national forests against ravages by fire. This is a question upon which we must all agree, whether we favor the present forestry policy, the policy of control by the several States, or the policy of throwing open to settlement vast areas included within the forest reserve.

Within the confines of the national forest to-day is untold wealth that belongs to the American people; and, no matter how this vast heritage shall be handled in the future, it is equally important that it shall be protected now.

It is estimated that at this time upon the forest reserves within the United States, exclusive of Alaska, there are 518,000,000,000 board feet of timber.

A few years ago timber of the character that is included within our forest reserves was sold at $1 per thousand, but it has increased in value. In 1909 it was sold at $1.75 per thousand; in 1910, $2.44 per thousand; in 1911, $2.56 per thousand; and if we figure the more than 500,000,000,000 feet of timber as worth the amount of the average sale of timber from our forest-reserve lands last year, we have a property in timber alone valued at more than $1,400,000,000.

Surely this wealth demands protection, but this is not all. If this timber should be destroyed, vast loss would occur on account of the immense cost that would be required for reforesting our lands. More than this, the property of the Federal Government can not be destroyed without destruction being visited upon the timber property of States and of individuals in the region in which the forest lands of the United States lie.

Hence I say it is a matter of vital concern to all our people, no matter what our views may be with respect to the ultimate forest-reserve policy within our country. Our forests now should be protected.

It is a matter of great good fortune to the United States that until the year 1910 very little property was destroyed by fire, and consequently a very small amount of money was required to maintain satisfactory forest protection.

It is altogether probable that had conditions been slightly different from those that prevailed the loss might have been terrific, because of our unpreparedness, but fortunately conditions were favorable and our losses were light. In 1908 we spent $73,283.53 for fire protection beyond the cost of regular maintenance in administering the forest reserve. In 1909 we spent less than this, or, in other words, $54,669.83. In 1910, however, when unusual conditions confronted the Forestry Department, with which it had to contend, we were compelled to spend $1,086,590.80 in order to cope in any way with the situation, and even then the loss that was sustained by our Government was enormous.

The winter of 1909 and 1910 and the spring following did not give the usual rainfall to the region in question. The result was that as the season opened the forest areas became dry early in the year. This made the danger from fire great, and with this there were coupled severe windstorms in the dry season.

During the summer of 1910 the Northwest suffered most seriously. Speaking of the forest lands belonging to the United States alone, the fires of that year destroyed 6,508,369,000 feet of timber. That year the average sales of timber brought something like $2.38 per thousand to the Government, and at that valuation the destruction of this timber in itself meant the loss to the Government of $14,889,724.

Here was a loss incurred in a single season to the United States alone in the destruction of property that was already in existence, and consequently an asset. It is estimated that the loss in the destruction of the forage upon the areas burned amounted to upward of $100,000. More than this, it is estimated that it will cost to reforest the burned areas more than $9,000,000, and in addition we will sustain a loss on account of a less area being able to yield timber from year to year, and consequently higher prices to the users of lumber.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I dislike very much to interrupt the gentleman, but I would like to know if the gentleman has read the report of the Forester before the Committee on Agriculture, in which he makes the distinct and definite statement that no amount of money Congress might have appropriated could have saved the forest fire of which the gentleman is now speaking?

Mr. FRENCH. I think that is correct so far as that particular year is concerned, as regards the appropriations that might have been made within a year or so prior to that time.

Mr. LEVER. Is it not a fact also that the Bureau of Forestry in fighting the fire spent something like $900,000, coming to Congress with a deficiency which Congress readily and promptly gave?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes; and it is with that in view that I want to call attention to the necessity of preparedness for forest fires.

Mr. LEVER. Is not it a fact also, in the opinion of the gentleman, that it is better policy to throw upon the administration of the forests the burden of making a deficit rather than giving to them the temptation of finding an emergency by holding out an appropriation of $1,000,000, as we had in the present law? By making such an appropriation it holds out to them the temptation of making this emergency when they really did not have an emergency.

Mr. FRENCH. In my judgment it is not. I think it is not good policy to require any administrative department to incur a deficiency. It is probable that this Congress would honor a deficiency that might be occasioned on account of such a disaster as that which occurred in 1910, but my judgment would be that the better policy would be to make the provision so that no deficiency would occur, if it is possible to do so.

Mr. LEVER. The difficulty about that is we could not with any degree of certainty set a limit upon the amount of money carried in the emergency fund.

Mr. FRENCH. That is true, but—

Mr. LEVER. And is not there a very great temptation when you hold out a great big emergency fund for the administrative officer to find the emergency, and he is likely to see imaginary emergencies and draw upon this fund for them?

Mr. LAMB. If my colleague will permit me, I will say that it is a fact that only $22,000 of this emergency fund has yet been used at all, and, judging the future by the past, we do not believe that any more of it will be used, or not much more, and we provide $200,000—

Mr. FRENCH. The statement of the gentleman from Virginia, although intended to support the position of the gentleman from South Carolina, is to my mind the very answer I would make. The fact that $1,000,000 was made available for the last year, and that only the small amount of $22,000 of that amount was used, certainly seems to me to indicate that the department was exercising splendid discretion in the use of the money that was made available.

Mr. LAMB. Nobody has denied that; but we do not propose to keep $1,000,000 in the Treasury set aside not to be used when there is no necessity, in our judgment, for so doing.

Mr. FRENCH. But there is in the present bill a provision for nearly 10 times the amount that was used last year—

Mr. LAMB. Because we wanted to be on the safe side, and that provision, with the $150,000 regular, gives about $400,000 for that work.

Mr. FRENCH. This, of course, after all, is more a matter of judgment as regards policy, and it was rather to the general question of being prepared, and also, to some extent, upon the question of policy, that I was addressing myself in discussing these features.

The grand total of loss to the United States in dollars and cents for the year 1910 amounts to more than twenty-four millions of dollars. Added to this as the loss to the people of our country must be the destruction of timber, of homes, the cost of reforesting, and the loss of timber and forage on lands owned by the States, or owned by private individuals and scattered throughout the forest areas.

But this is not all. The loss that appeals to us most keenly as a result of the forest fires of 1910 is in the sacrifice of life that was met that year. Seventy-eight employees of the Forestry Service of the United States lost their lives during the summer of 1910 in fighting forest fires. Many others lost their lives who were fighting fires on their own account, or who had homes within the forest areas.

The story of the suffering of victims in my own State that has been related to me is harrowing in the extreme—suffering and death of persons not in the employ of the Government, but equally deserving of the Government's protection.

The loss of life sometimes may not mean so much as injury or other consequences, and many are the persons who will be compelled to go through life partially or almost totally incapacitated on account of their experience. I have pending in the present Congress a bill for the relief of one of the employees of the Government who, while he escaped with his life, will, in all probability, never again be able to do the work of a day. I have another bill for the relief of the widow and little children of one of the victims of the forest fires who was in the employ of the Government and whose family were left almost destitute.

These and other cases to which I could refer suggest something of the horror that follows in the wake of a devastation by fire such as that which occurred in 1910.

Going still further into the burden which the fire of 1910 entailed, I would say that as the Federal Government was not authorized and had no means of lawfully bearing the medical and hospital expense of those who were injured by fighting fires and in caring for those who lost their lives, contributions were voluntarily made by employees of the Forestry Service and by others as soon as the necessity became apparent. More than this, the loss was so serious and the hardships so great that the National Red Cross Society offered its assistance and did its share of the work necessary to meet the immediate situation.

The expenses incurred here I have no memorandum of, and as they were borne by a scattered number of persons, it will probably be impossible to even estimate the same.

Probably I need not go into much detail in describing the condition that exists with respect to the ownership of land within forest-reserve areas. It is true that the forest reserves of the Government are not compact, but the States have areas of forest land which adjoin the reserves of the Federal Government and extend into and are surrounded by these reserves. It is also true that thousands of settlers have their little homes in these same regions.

Some of the lands are already owned in fee simple by the settlers. Other lands are being made into homes by these settlers, and all of the property, whether owned by the State or by the individual, is deserving equally of protection. And the States and the settlers and other owners of timber are bearing their share of this responsibility, as I shall point out.

The forest areas of my own State, Idaho, were fortunately, in the year 1910, not within the most disastrous fire belt, yet that year the State lost $30,000 worth of timber, and it cost the State $60,000 more as its share of the burden in fighting fires.

The losses in wealth and in life to which I have called attention are the losses sustained chiefly by the Federal Forest Service. It is not possible for me to give even approximately the figures that will represent the loss sustained by the States and by private individuals scattered over the large areas that suffered on account of the forest fires. However, I think that it requires nothing of imagination, but simply a fair deduction from the facts in hand, to demonstrate clearly to anyone that the loss to State and to individuals must itself have been great.

There is another expense to which I have not called attention that will have to be met ultimately by our Government. To-day we have a law under which if a railway mail clerk is killed in line of duty his family may be compensated to the extent of $2,000. A similar bill is pending with respect to rural free-delivery carriers. This policy is right, because when an injury occurs to an employee of a private concern there is always the opportunity for redress or for a settlement within our courts. With the Federal Government it is different. The heirs of the particular victim injured in a railroad wreck while he is in line of duty as a railway mail clerk can not sue the Government for damages, and it is a wise provision of law that enables the Postmaster General to make settlement with the ones dependent upon this employee.

This same principle will undoubtedly be applied to all lines of Government service where the employment is hazardous, and who can say that the service of those who are protecting the forest areas of our Government is not hazardous when a single year has claimed not less than 78 victims—persons who were working for the Government.

Already the Congress has made appropriation for relieving as much as possible the burden in connection with those who were killed or injured, and undoubtedly there will be still greater demand, for in a service that carries with it so much of hazard the Government will be asked to assume still more of responsibility.

What is the cause of forest fires? That is a question that is of vital importance in connection with considering this problem, because if we can once get at the cause, maybe we can get at the remedy. The forestry department estimates in its report of 1910 that 12 per cent of the forest fires were caused by lightning, that 84 per cent were caused by the lack of reasonable care upon the part of forest users and by the railroad locomotives which traverse the forest areas. This would leave 4 per cent caused by other reasons.

The report for 1911 is more specific with respect to the causes of fires. I find that in that year the department estimates that nearly 14 per cent of the fires were caused by lightning, nearly 33 per cent by railroad locomotives, a little more than 13 per cent by campers, a little less than 6 per cent on account of incendiarism, a little less than 6 per cent as a result of indiscretion in burning brush, a little less than 1 per cent on account of sawmills and donkey engines, more than 44 per cent from miscellaneous causes, and nearly 23 per cent from causes that have not been ascertained by the department.

No one can examine these figures without being convinced that by reasonable care upon the part of our railroads, of our campers, and of our people who, in clearing land must burn their brush, many fires could be avoided.

Undoubtedly the effort that is now being made by our Government and by our States and by the fire associations throughout the country to impress upon these persons the necessity and advisability of utmost care with respect to fires in forest areas deserves the hearty commendation and encouragement of our people.

Still there remains nearly 14 per cent of fires caused by lightning, and in spite of the most reasonable care that can be taken undoubtedly from time to time some fires will be started. By the aid, then, of a hurricane or of a straight wind the opportunity for destruction would be great.

Another matter that is of immediate interest to the Congress in considering this question is the aid that is given in the way of forest protection by private citizens and by States.

It happens that I live in a region surrounded by forest areas owned by the Government, by the State of Idaho, and by numerous private companies and individuals. Here probably is as good an illustration of the working system as it should exist.

The associations which comprise all of these three classes of owners, with the exception of the very inconsiderable number of private individuals, exist for the protection of the common property on the timber areas. Undoubtedly the private individual who is not a member of the association, but who is interested in the protection of the timber on the little tract of land that he owns, does his full part for fire protection. So instead of being a loss he is a gain to the fire service.

The association, however, which does embrace the large owners of timber divides the cost of fire patrol proportionately among them. In this way the State bears its share, the private individuals bear their share, and the Federal Government bears its.

I might say, in this connection, that this system is the most economical system that has so far been devised and has proved of great economy to the Federal Government, as well as to the State and the private owners of timber.

It saves double patrol work and it enables a less number of men to cover a larger area and to be able to concentrate the forces necessary at a point of danger.

I am especially anxious that Congress shall understand the working system, because the Members of Congress should know that the Federal Government is not called upon to protect the private property of the individuals or the property of the State, other than such protection will come from protecting its own property, and this is a kind that is returned by the reciprocal service of the State and of the private individual.

I am advised that the system that I have outlined, and which applies to northern Idaho, applies also to other regions, and that it is believed that a complete system of fire patrol of this character will soon cover almost every area of timberland in which the Government is interested.

I am also informed that some of the railroads traversing forest regions have already taken steps, by installing spark arresters on their locomotives or by burning oil, to put an end to this cause of forest fires. Some of them have not done this, and the situation will need to be met in a manner that will mean for the elimination of this large element of danger to our forest areas.

The first question that is of vital interest to this Congress is the one with respect to what is being done to meet the situation at a time when the fire is not actually causing its destruction.

In answer to that, I would say that more and more protection is being furnished by the destruction of underbrush as timber is felled, and by the building of roads and trails through the forest and the establishment of telephone communication and organization. This work should receive the hearty cooperation of Congress and of everybody, regardless of what the different beliefs may be with respect to the ultimate forestry policy. We must stand for the protection of our forest area, not only at the time the fire may be playing havoc, but we should make preparation at a time when there is no fire so as to protect our forests with the greatest efficiency when the lightning or the careless camper or the railroad may start the blaze.

In this work much has been done, but at best, with the vast area of forest lands, only a small amount could be accomplished with the money that has been made available in the past, and the chief forester estimates that it would cost five hundred thousand a year for 15 years to bring up, through roads and trails and other means for protecting our forests—the forest areas of the United States—so that they could be reasonably protected with the minimum of expense.

Assuming that the figures of the Forester are correct, this would mean an appropriation during the period of 15 years of seven and one-half million of dollars. The Forester advises me that any cut at this time necessarily will delay the time that this forest property will be secure from destruction.

We can not consider the appropriation of so large an amount as that involved without asking ourselves whether or not it is the economical thing to do. The question of economy is sufficiently answered when I point out, as I have already pointed out, that the loss of 1910 alone in timber and in forage was more than twice the total amount that it is estimated would be necessary during a period of 15 years to put our forests in a reasonable position for the withstanding of forest fires.

From that standpoint the appropriation suggested seems not an extravagance, but the most reasonable economy that could be practiced by our people.

Making another comparison, the total amount in question covering the period of 15 years is nearly $2,000,000 less than the amount that it will be necessary to expend in order to reforest the area that was burned over in the fires of 1910.

When there is considered the fact that the money spent for putting our forests into the best shape for their own protection is spent for the protection of values conservatively estimated as upward of $1,400,000,000, we must again be impressed with the thought that this is true economy.

The money, however, to which I have referred is that which would be required for what we should call permanent improvements. In addition thereto this Congress should make available for use in case of an emergency as much money as was made available one year ago. One year ago the Congress made available for use in case of an emergency in fighting fires $1,000,000. The present bill proposes an emergency fund of $200,000. Ordinarily this amount would be sufficient. It is far in excess of the amount expended last year or in 1908 or in 1909, but is less than one-fifth the amount that was found necessary to meet the situation in 1910.

At that time, in the absence of the appropriation for this purpose, it was necessary that a deficiency be created to meet the situation, and it should not be necessary for the administrative officer of the Government to create this deficiency.

It is to be hoped that at no time in the future will the experience of 1910 be repeated, but we should not fail to make such reasonable provision as will enable those intrusted with this tremendous asset of the Government to meet the situation and protect the people's property and their lives as fully as the conditions would warrant.

Because the city of Washington might be fortunate in passing through a year or several years without a serious conflagration we would not discontinue the fire department of the city. Because the experience of the Baltimore disaster of a few years ago has not been repeated in Baltimore, that city should not discontinue its fire protection, and because we safely passed through one year following the experience of 1910, in which, while the Government made available an emergency fund of $1,000,000 to be used for fire protection without the necessity for drawing upon that fund, we should not take the position that everything is secure for the future and fail to make adequate provision at this time.

It is for this reason that I hope that this Congress when the items to which I refer shall be reached will feel that it is not an extravagance, but rather that it is in the interest of plain economy to make the reasonable appropriations necessary to protect the property and the lives of the people within our forest areas.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to my colleague [Mr. LEVER].

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the statement of the gentleman from Idaho touching the matter of the reduction of the million-dollar emergency fund carried in the Forestry Bureau for the purpose of fire fighting. I desire to say I do not believe there is a committee in this House which is as strongly in favor of forest preservation as the Committee on Agriculture. Most of us on that committee have grown up with the Forestry Service, and we have seen the appropriations for it jump from a few hundred thousand dollars up into millions of dollars. The present law carries an appropriation of $1,000,000 for the purpose of fighting fire—an appropriation carried in an emergency fund. In addition to that it carries $150,000 to be expended by the Forest Service in fighting ordinary forest fires. When the Committee on Agriculture took up the Bureau of Forestry for consideration, to provide for it the money with which it should be run for the next fiscal year, it struck the committee that it was bad policy to lock up in the Treasury the sum of $1,000,000 to meet an emergency that might not occur once in 50 years.

We had the experience with a great fire in the West in 1910, when the Forestry Bureau used something like $900,000 above its appropriation and, coming back to Congress, had no difficulty at all in making up the deficiency. We felt that if a great emergency fire should happen to arise, whether there was an emergency appropriation or not, the Forestry Service would be under the most solemn obligations to go out and meet the emergency, and that they would not stop for one instant to consider whether or not there was locked up in the Treasury of the United States $1,000,000 as an emergency fund for this purpose, or whether they would have to come to Congress and ask for a deficiency appropriation. We concluded, therefore, that it would be, as a matter of policy, better for us to give them a small emergency appropriation of $200,000, which we have provided in this bill, plus $150,000, which the bill has carried from year to year, making a total of $350,000 for the purpose of fighting forest fires as they may occur in the national forests, and turn back into the general fund $800,000, which is now locked up in the Federal Treasury and kept out of the ordinary channels, money that we can not appropriate, and money that we can not get hold of in any way. And hence the committee has, I say, reduced the present $1,000,000 emergency fund to $200,000.

In that connection I desire to say that the emergency fund of $1,000,000 has never before been carried in any bill except the present law, and that came about on account of the terrific fire which they had out in the West in 1910, and which scared the Committee on Agriculture half to death. That is the truth of the matter.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BORLAND, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 18960) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Crook, one of his secretaries.

VETO MESSAGE—JOHN L. BAIRD (H. DOC. NO. 574).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following veto message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith without my approval an act entitled "An act for the relief of John L. Baird," H. R. 8853.

My reasons are stated in letters from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Agriculture, and Assistant Attorney General Knaebel, which accompany this communication.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 27, 1912.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the message and the accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF REMARKS IN THE RECORD.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I would like to submit a request for unanimous consent. A few days ago I made an address over in New Jersey on the subject of the initiative, referendum, and recall, which I would like to have permission to print in the Record.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] asks unanimous consent to print in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a speech that he recently delivered in the State of New Jersey on the subject of the initiative, referendum, and recall. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and regretting we will not have the opportunity of hearing the speech, I do not object. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire by whom this speech was delivered?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. By me.

Mr. RAKER. In favor of or against the recall?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The gentleman ought to know me well enough to know that I would not make one in favor of it.

Mr. RAKER. Knowing the gentleman so well, I withdraw the objection.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the request?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a speech which he recently delivered in the State of New Jersey on the initiative, referendum, and recall.

Mr. COOPER. It was against the initiative and referendum? Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following is the address above referred to:

"MR. PRESIDENT, LADIES, AND GENTLEMEN: I think that I would be less than human, certainly less than American, if I were not impressed with the facts of our surroundings—facts which would certainly furnish inspiration, had I either the wit, words, or the power of speech to stir men's blood. No words of commendation can be overpraise for the men who conceived and brought into being the patriotic purpose of rescuing from the uncertain and fixing with definiteness the spot where the Stars and Stripes were first unfurled as the flag of our Republic; and I hail the day, which can not be far distant, when this great Government, which has sent that banner of liberty as a messenger of hope to the oppressed of all the earth, will mark this spot by a monument in keeping with the sacred sentiment which inspires it, and of such proportions and artistic beauty as to be worthy the full significance with which a century of high achievement has crowned so important an event.

"But what a task to put upon an artist! To chisel out of cold, unspeaking stone a story really worthy an event so meaning full. Behind them the wilderness of an uncharted continent, a little band of brave and determined men hauled down that flag which was the acknowledged symbol of power as far as the ocean bore its foam, hoisted in its stead their own starry banner to announce the birth of a new evangel, and challenged to mortal combat the political doctrines which had thwarted the liberties and the consciences of men since the stars sang together when the world was born. But whatever the limitations of the artist's hand, however his fancy may fail him in the task, the story which that shaft shall tell will crown it with a halo before which the lovers of liberty and of men will stand uncovered to the end.

"Wherever that flag floats to-day it is saluted with salvos from ships and batteries. Wherever Americans live to-day, they have left off their accustomed labors and have gone forth to a national holiday, because it is the anniversary of that day when he was born who, we delight to say, was the Father of his Country. There is not a land beneath the skies where its story has not been told, and with every race which has come beneath the beneficent light of its stars the name of Washington is a household word.

"We have gathered here to-day, inspired by the patriotic purposes of your association, to commemorate the birth of the flag as a national emblem, to further the movement to have this hallowed spot designated in appropriate fashion to the end that those who pass this way in the years to come may mark it as one of the mileposts along that long and bloody trail which led at last to Yorktown! He is a bold man who will undertake to say just when and where that trail began—whether at Lexington, at Naseby, at Runnymede, or in the Black Forests of Germany, when Arminius first checked the victorious flight of the Roman eagles. In fact, that is not the end of the road we are most vitally interested in. The study of the story of that long struggle and an appreciation of the heroic sacrifices which its every turn discloses are an inspiration to patriotism, and patriotism is the foundation stone upon which good citizenship is builded. But it is vouchsafed to us, as it was not vouchsafed to the fathers, to look back upon a long fight which has already eventuated in victory. The divine right of kings has perished, and in its stead that other theory that governments which are instituted among men derive their just powers from the consent of the governed has triumphed.

"When we look back over the road which we have traveled since that good day what a story reels before us. The wilderness which hemmed them in has fallen; the continent has been conquered; in strict obedience to the divine injunction they have multiplied, replenished, and subdued the earth; and to-day 90,000,000 Americans are gathered together throughout the confines of the Republic to pay grateful tribute to the memory of him who wrought so well for us, and to consecrate anew our lives, our fortunes, and our most sacred honor to the lofty task of maintaining in their integrity these institutions of freedom for our children. This is the burden upon us; this is the duty we owe to the men who have gone before us as well as to the men who are to come after us. I would not, of course, upon an occasion like this violate the proprieties by making a political speech, but there are some questions which, in their importance, transcend mere matters of party dispute, as they involve a change in the very fundamental principles upon which our Government is founded. To a discussion of these questions, briefly, of course, under the necessary and proper limitations of the occasion, I shall address my remarks to-day, believing that there could be 'No place so meet, no time so apt' for such a discussion as at Bound Brook on the 22d of February.

"The men who founded this Republic were no novices. Search the history of mankind and I believe no body of men better equipped for the task before them ever sat together for a common purpose. Washington, Hamilton, Madison, Pinckney, Franklin, Livingston, Patterson—names to conjure the world. They knew what the mailed hand meant; they had felt it. They knew what the man on horseback meant; they had seen him. They knew what the struggle for liberty meant; they had fought it; and they brought to their task a knowledge of the history of the governments which had gone before them, and an understanding of the rights and the limitations of man which few, if any, similar bodies of men ever possessed before or since that day.

"In every crisis in the history of our race—and when I say crisis, I mean a crisis—and I believe that it is a justification of our boast that as a race we are the most capable of freedom—the biggest and the bravest and the most capable men have been chosen by the people to do the work at hand. The demagogue, always the forerunner and apostle of calamity, has never held the center of the stage except to squeak and gibber in the piping times of peace. And so it came to pass that when the great crisis confronted our fathers in 1787, when the old confederacy was about to crumble and the very liberty which they had so dearly bought was in the balance, they chose for the tremendous task the men best equipped for that high responsibility. It is a fact worthy of remembrance that when these great architects entered Independence Hall to frame a written constitution which would either justify or defeat their claim that the people were capable of self-government they locked the doors behind them, entered a pledge of secrecy, and not until 50 years after the convention adjourned were the seals broken and the history of their proceedings made public.

"I sometimes wonder if the distinguished gentlemen who are so insistent to-day upon overturning the representative Government which these great statesmen gave us, and who cry aloud so persistently for a 'restoration of popular government,' would be willing to undertake that responsibility with the activities of the press agent similarly restricted and the fascinating prospect of the headlines entirely removed.

"Did they do well—else why do we celebrate? I am one of those who believe that from that good day until now the flag whose birth we glorify to-day has been the symbol of righteousness, and never more so than on this good day, February 22, 1912. But times have changed, we are told, and in the process of the suns we have outgrown the ancient instrument. We have progressed, and may the Lord have mercy on his political soul who is not a Progressive. I believe few men in or out of politics would be willing to admit that they are opposed to progress, but I do believe that it is a saying worthy of prayerful consideration that all change is not progress.

"I am one of those who entertain the belief, whether that faith be a manifestation of a spirit progressive or reactionary, that the people of this Republic have not lost their capacity for self-government, and that therefore the men whom they have chosen to places of high honor and great responsibility in their Government are honest, high purposed, and patriotic. I have been in public life a long time, and I have been thrown in intimate and constant association with men of all parties and in all branches of the public service, and it is my deliberate judgment that the man who is charged with the responsibility of office, and who, for sinister purposes, betrays his trust, is one of the rare products of our civilization. I say this because thereby I wish to express the conviction which is in my heart, that representative government as established by the fathers and which has stood the test of time and the shock of war has not proven a failure. If we are to abandon this system now and set up in its stead another, let those who champion the change at least cite us to the page of this wide world's history which tells the story they would have us emulate. As for my single self, I shall refuse to prefer any system of government which had been put to the test of time before this more perfect union was formed, because there are no statesmen of my generation who have had better opportunities to study those systems than had the framers of our Constitution, and there are none now in whose judgment in such matters I have greater faith than I have in Madison and Hamilton and their fellows. The citation must be to a page of the history of the century just closed—a page written side by side with the history of our own national life, a page which must crowd into 120 years more that has made for human liberty and human happiness than is told in our own story.

"A few years ago one of the most distinguished men of our times—at that time the President of the United States—lamenting the hard conditions of these times and casting about for a prescription which would revitalize the body politic, declared that 'what we need is through Executive action, through legislation, and through judicial interpretation and construction of law, to increase the power of the Federal Government.' Not, you will observe, by the orderly processes pointed out by the Constitution, which we are all sworn to support and defend, but by 'Executive action,' by 'legislation,' and by 'judicial construction' to increase the power of the Federal Government. A short while after this another distinguished gentleman—then the Secretary of State—announced that unless the States exercised the powers which were theirs under the Constitution 'sooner or later constructions of the Constitution will be found to vest the power in the Federal Government.' 'The instinct of self-government among the people,' he warns us, 'is too strong to permit them long to respect anyone's right to exercise power which he fails to exercise.' And so it has come to pass that if we continue to insist upon shaping our conduct by the square of that government of checks and balances bequeathed to us in trust as a priceless legacy for our children, constructions will be found to substitute instead a government by instinct.

"I would not presume to answer two such distinguished statesmen as Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Root with any argument of my own, but here at Bound Brook, on the 22d day of February, I shall presume to read the words of Washington, the foremost man in the tide of time:

"It is important likewise that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration, to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding in the exercise of the powers of one department to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism. If, in the opinion of the people, the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the Constitution designates. But let there be no change by usurpation, for though this in one instance may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed.

"On the one hand, it is proposed to change the Government we now have and thereby, as Washington tells us, 'create, whatever its form, a real despotism' by having the court to find constructions by which all power may be centralized in Washington. On the other hand, we are told that the courts have already found constructions which will deliver us body and boots into the hands of the malefactors of great wealth, and therefore we shall have the recall of judges, so that when the umpire decides against the home team the whole matter may be referred to the bleachers.

"I am a very humble member of the bar, and yet I hold it a high honor that I have been permitted to enroll my name with the members of that great profession. I believe the highest office in any government is that which calls a man to sit in judgment on the life, the liberty, and the property of his fellows. The supreme test of the capacity of any people for self-government is, in the last analysis: Did they under their system of government put upon the bench men who measured up to the full stature of a just and fearless judge? I believe that we have stood that test.

"There was never a time when it was more universally desired that a construction of the Constitution should be found to amplify the Federal power than when the great Marshall sat in judgment at the trial of Aaron Burr. By killing Hamilton, Burr had incurred the fiery hatred of the Federalists to an extent never seen, except under the impulse of religious fanaticism. On the other hand, Jefferson had accused him of treason against his country and so brought down upon his head the maledictions of the Democrats. From every side there arose the universal cry, 'Crucify him! Crucify him!' and yet this great judge, chief sinner among the broad Constitutionals though he was, refused to find constructions which would so extend the Federal power as to recognize the doctrine of 'constructive presence' where the overt act was committed, and so Burr was set free.

"When the great Taney, a worthy successor to the illustrious Marshall, was called upon to render the decision in the case of Dred Scott, who demanded his freedom under the terms of the Missouri Compromise, the peace of the Nation was at stake, yet the Supreme Court refused to find a construction which would extend the power of the Federal Government beyond the limitations fixed by the Constitution.

"In 1865, when the echo of the last rebel yell had scarcely faded away and the roar of the cannon had but lately ceased in the valley of the Shenandoah, when Jefferson Davis, a vicarious sufferer, lay shackled in Fortress Monroe and the overburdened air was literally rent with execrations against the doctrine of State's rights, the Supreme Court of the United States declared that 'the Federal Government possesses no powers except such as have been delegated to it by the Constitution; the States have all except those which they have surrendered.'

"I know that—

In the corrupted currents of this world
Offense's gilded hand may shove by justice,
And oft 'tis said the guilty prize itself
Buys out the law.

"But I know also that those words were written when every judge in England was subject to the recall.

"The men who wrote our Constitution knew of Jeffreys and the Bloody Assizes, and they knew also the story of Lord Coke. There was no greater lawyer in all England than Lord Coke, and none who coveted more the glory of the ermine. One day he and his associates were brought before the King and commanded peremptorily to reverse a judgment they had rendered. They fell upon their knees and promised immediate compliance, all save Coke. He alone rose to the full stature of his great office and hurling his official robes at the astonished monarch, replied, 'I shall do that only which becomes a judge of England.' James II was no worse than many of his predecessors. He and they had the power under the law to appoint the judges, and they had the power to recall them at pleasure. All the technicalities of the common law, the ghosts of which still haunt our statute books, were simply devices which the Commons had conjured up in their efforts to protect the people from the harsh and oftentimes cruel judgments of these dependent judges. They were contrivances to enable the innocent subject to escape the condemnation of these judges, and not, as they too frequently are to-day, to furnish an avenue of escape for the guilty from the just judgment of the law.

"The Saxon has fought against tyranny since he first appeared upon the stage of history, and at last old England, sick unto death with this malady of puppet judges, drove the Stuarts from the throne; but let us not forget this fact—that when they wrote the Act of Settlement, which passed the crown to the Prince of Orange, they provided in it that thereafter their judges should hold by no such uncertain tenure, but should be placed beyond the shifting caprice of the sovereign and should hold their offices for life. This was the act of those who had lived and walked and had their daily being under the bloody terror of these dependent judges; and our fathers, after noting the course of justice for a hundred years under these changed conditions, and comparing it with the reign of terror when the judges were compelled to adjust their decrees to suit the fancy of the sovereign, in the fullness of that wisdom which guided their deliberations throughout the long session of the convention, preferred to profit by the lessons of history. They therefore wrote into our Constitution that our judges should hold for life, subject to removal only by the orderly process of impeachment. By the Act of Settlement the English judges were removable by impeachment and also "upon address of the Parliament" for cause which might not justify impeachment, but the framers of our Constitution rejected even the removal by address, relying solely upon the power of impeachment to protect them from the usurpations and tyrannies of the court.

"It is now deliberately proposed to return to the old system under which Jeffreys flourished and Coke was recalled. What is the reason for this reactionary step, suggested in the name of progress? The judges, we are told, are too subject to the sinister influence of the special interests, and therefore we are to provide a remedy by giving the people frequent opportunity to select better and braver men. It is a curious fact that no man ever advocates the recall who is not also in favor of the initiative and referendum. The bench is to be purged of the hirelings of predatory wealth by frequent elections, and yet the legislator is to be shorn of his functions because the people are unable to pick an honest man.

"In order that we may understand the full import of this proposition for the recall of our judges let me read an extract from the Appeal to Reason. This was published last year when the campaign was on in the State of California. At that time the McNamara brothers were awaiting trial on a charge—to which they subsequently pleaded guilty—of having murdered some 21 workmen by blowing up a house, the property of a man whom they wished to punish. At that time Mr. Debs made this illuminating contribution to the campaign for 'the restoration of popular government':

"The fight at the polls this fall will center around the adoption of the initiative, referendum, and recall amendments to the constitution. Under the provisions of the recall amendment the judges of the Supreme Court of California can be retired. These are men who will decide the fate of the kidnapped workers. Don't you see what it means, comrades, to have in the hands of an intelligent, militant working class the political power to recall the present capitalist judges and put on the bench our own men? Was there ever such an opportunity for effective work? No; not since socialism first raised its crimson banner on the shores of Morgan's country. The election for governor and State officers of California does not occur till 1914. But with the recall at our command we can put our own men in office without waiting for a regular election.

"This is one of the changes proposed by our progressive leaders, but there are others. One of the beauties of progress consists in its infinite variety. After centralizing all power in the Federal Government by 'finding constructions,' by 'Executive action,' by 'legislation,' and by having the recall put 'our own men' on the bench, as Mr. Debs put it and as Mr. James II did it, we are to add still further to the gayety of nations by progressing back some score or more of centuries and still further 'restore popular government' by adopting the compulsory initiative and referendum.

"The initiative and referendum are neither the discovery nor the invention of modern statesmanship. Restoration of popular government is a very catchy phrase, but even the art of phrase making is as old as the conflict of human ambitions. There were springs to catch woodcocks before our day. If popular government has been lost, under what system of government did it flourish? We should know this in order that we may turn to that page of history and study carefully the workings of that governmental system before we exchange our own for it. When I was a boy we used sometimes to swap 'sight unseen,' but experience did not commend the wisdom of that procedure to my judgment. The history of the democracies of the old world revolved in a fatal cycle—democracy, anarchy, despotism. We boast of Anglo-Saxon civilization. What contribution has the Saxon made to the science of government? There were monarchies and democracies, there were republics before his day. The contribution which he made was indeed a notable one which has been copied by all the peoples of the earth as they have advanced in liberty since that day, and that contribution was the system of representative government. When our fathers met in Philadelphia and undertook the serious business of sifting out of all the experiences of man a governmental system that would secure the blessings of liberty to them and to their posterity, they preferred this one and wrote it into the Constitution and hedged it about with such limitations as to make its amendment practically impossible except by revolution. Since that day all the liberty-seeking peoples of the earth have sought to copy it. The story of its success is told wherever men gather around their hearthstones and talk of liberty.

"A few years ago a delegation of Congressmen were sent abroad upon a public mission. One evening they attended a popular gathering at a little place just within the Russian border. It was an occasion of great importance in that country—a sort of national holiday. A military band sat in the pavilion and played the national airs of the country. At last, out of compliment to the American representatives present, they played 'Hail Columbia, Happy Land.' Instantly the peasants, who had theretofore stood off in the distance, began to draw near and applaud. It was not the music that appealed to them; as a musical production it was not equal to the others, but it told its story even in that far land, and those oppressed people gathered about the stand and encored, not once, but twice, and yet again, inspired by the hope that maybe in the fullness of God's providence the light of liberty, which blessed that far off 'Happy Land,' might some day, somewhere, somehow, illumine the political darkness of their own unhappy valleys.

"Representative government was evolved out of the theory that sovereignty is, and of right ought to be, in the people, and that the people are endowed with sufficient intelligence and with sufficient patriotism to select out of their number representatives who will honestly and faithfully perform all of the functions of government. How is that done under our Constitution? Let us trace, for instance, the genesis of a statute.

"In the first place, the people are divided into districts according to population. They select from among their number a man in whose integrity and ability they have confidence. He repairs to the seat of government and with the other representatives similarly chosen organizes the Legislature by selecting a presiding officer, adopting rules of procedure, and dividing the membership into small groups or committees, each with its particular jurisdiction prescribed. The Member introduces a bill; it is referred to the proper committee for examination and report. This committee then summon before them those who are familiar with the subject matter, and after hearing all who desire to be heard on the subject, both for and against, a subcommittee is appointed to whip it into proper form and verbiage. The full committee then reports the measure to the House, when it is read by sections, debated, amended, and passed. It is then sent to the other Chamber—because under our system of government two Chambers are as much a tradition as trial by jury—where it goes through a similar process. If there are changes made by the other House, committees of conference are appointed by the two Chambers and the differences are discussed and an agreement reached, and then both Chambers take up the bill as amended, and after further discussion pass it and send it to the Executive for his approval. But even after all the relentless scrutiny to which the bill has thus been subjected it sometimes happens that its provisions run counter to the fundamental principles which are written into the Constitution, and so the law may be questioned by any person whose rights have been infringed and in due course must be passed upon by the courts of the country.

"Can human ingenuity conjure up a scheme by which erring man can be better secured in his rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, to secure which all governments are instituted among men? Now, look upon that picture and on this. I hold in my hand an exemplification of the initiative and referendum, stripped of all its rhetoric, of all its pretended faith in the people. This is the concrete fact and not the much vaunted and glorified sham.

"This is an official ballot used in South Dakota in the election of November, 1910. It is, by actual measurement, 5 feet 6 inches long and 10 inches wide. It proposes six entirely separate matters of legislation, varying from 'the regulation of the transportation of dead bodies' to 'the organization of the National Guard.' It is closely printed in very small type and contains 16,830 words. The voter must vote 'yes' or 'no.' No opportunity to alter or amend; no chance or opportunity for any discussion of its innumerable paragraphs. Oh, Liberty! Liberty! What crimes have been committed in thy name!

"My countrymen, do you believe that your life, your liberty, or your property will be better safeguarded by this wild, fantastic counterfeit than by the orderly processes which have stood the test of human scrutiny, of talent, and of time?

"If this law, so fearfully and wonderfully made, receives a majority of the votes cast, no veto can head it off in its mad rush for the statute book, and if perchance this tragedy reach the Supreme Court, and there for the first time it occurs to somebody to read it and thereupon it is ascertained to contravene the plain mandates of the Constitution, the next scene will open with his honor on the stump, endeavoring to justify his imprudent, if not impudent, curiosity in a campaign for his recall.

"We are told that the people have lost faith in their legislators. When did they lose it? Since the last election? If so, then they will have a chance this year to select legislators in whom they do have confidence. It is an insult to the people of this country to say that they have not enough discriminating judgment left to choose out of their own number men who will be faithful for two years. If they have lost that quality, then all hope for any government based on popular sovereignty has gone. I wish to enter my protest against so mean an imputation against our people. If I would suggest any change, it would be to elect Representatives for four years instead of two. What is needed is to remove this sword of Damocles, instead of weakening the thread which suspends it. Let us trust the people more in the selection of their Representatives; add to the responsibilities of the great office, instead of subtracting from its dignity and importance through the referendum. Fortify him with responsible power, but do not reduce him to the irresponsible condition of old Father Adam before his ungallant behavior in the Garden of Eden, which charged him finally with the responsibility of choosing between good and evil and elevated him to the dignity of a breadwinner.

"When will the average man, who has to eat his bread in the sweat of his face, find time to obey this scriptural injunction, if 8 per cent of the people can put the initiative and referendum into operation and 25 per cent can order a recall? Of course, the more frequent the elections the greater the notoriety of some gentlemen whose activities are thus blazoned to a listening world, and the greater the fame the bigger the gate receipts. But how about the rest of flesh? When that bright day comes the busiest man in the Government will be the tally clerk, and the dulcet song of the ticket vendor will relegate the hurdy-gurdy to innocuous desuetude.

"If we are to adhere to the fundamental principle of popular government, that the majority should rule, we must withhold from the minority this lash by which the professionally discontented few can scourge the representatives of that majority from the temples of power and responsibility by senseless and ceaseless trial at the polls.

"Just one more thought in conclusion. Let no man embrace these cure-all nostrums that political thrift may follow fawning. The people of this country do not want their laws written through the crude and ponderous processes of the initiative and referendum. No people want it. In Switzerland, whither we are so frequently referred, the electorate became so thoroughly tired of these ceaseless elections that it became necessary to provide by law a punishment for every man who failed to vote, but even then they refused to attempt the exercise of a function for which they were not qualified and deposited their ballots unmarked.

"When the constitutional convention in Mississippi concluded its labors in 1890 they declared the constitution, which they had framed, adopted without referring it back to the people. It provided of necessity for amendment, and when one is proposed by the legislature it must be ratified by the people. After much agitation of the question, two years ago an amendment was proposed changing the system of selecting judges from appointment by the governor to election by the people. There was no other contest on, and when the election day came only 25,000 votes were cast—17,000 voters favored the change, and the amendment was adopted.

"A few years ago less than 10 per cent of the voters of New York voted an amendment to their constitution. Even in California, where these so-called progressive ideas are apparently most popular, in the election last fall, after a campaign so noisy as to attract the attention of the entire country, when 23 separate amendments were submitted to the people, the one providing for woman suffrage, which received the highest vote of any, received less votes than Mr. Bryan received in 1908, when Taft carried the State by 90,000 majority.

"The people will refuse to undertake the functions of the legislator, and the discontented few, always the most clamorous for every change—and the more radical the change the more active their enthusiasm—will write the laws of the land. Majority rule, which can obtain only in a representative democracy, will be overthrown, and the rule of the minority substituted for it, and that, too, under the specious and wholly misleading pretense of 'restoring popular government.'

"I do not challenge the good faith or the high purpose of those who are urging this revolution with such earnestness and marked ability. They are all Chanticleers, crowing upon the hilltops, firm in the faith that they are thereby causing the sun of popular government to rise. But with all regard for their plumage and their faith, I prefer the judgment of those humbler cocks down in the valley, who believe in the daylight when they see it.

"In view of all the history of the past, with its bloody struggles of the many against the oppressions of the few, remembering the glorious victories which at last crowned the sacrifices of our fathers, under the folds of that flag whose birth we glorify to-day, let us join in one universal prayer—

"Lord God of Hosts, be with us yet,
"Lest we forget, lest we forget."

Mr. BURTON submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 238), which was read and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed 500 copies of Senate Document No. 274 for the use of the Corps of Engineers, United States Army.

SURVEY OF SHIPYARD RIVER, S. C. (S. DOC. NO. 350).

Mr. NELSON. I have a letter from W. H. Bixby, Chief of Engineers, United States Army, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the Senate Committee on Commerce, copies of reports on the examination and survey of the Shipyard River, S. C., which was printed for the use of the committee. The supply is exhausted. I move that it be printed as a document for the use of the Senate document room.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 20111. An act making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

KATE FERRELL.

Mr. OLIVER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5287) for the relief of Kate Ferrell.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to pay to Kate Ferrell, widow of John Ferrell, $1,080, this being the amount of the annual salary of the said John Ferrell, who at the time of his death was an employee of the Bureau of Mines, and came to his death on January 19, 1912, in a mine at Cherry Valley, Washington County, Pa., while engaged, under the direction of the Bureau of Mines, in the hazardous employment and work of exploring said mine filled with poisonous gases.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SENATOR FROM DELAWARE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the following resolution coming over from yesterday.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 230, submitted by Mr. REED on the 26th instant, authorizing and directing the Committee on Privileges and Elections to investigate certain charges against HENRY ALGERNON DU PONT, a Senator from the State of Delaware.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, upon this resolution I desire to submit some remarks, if this is an appropriate time to do so.

When on Monday I introduced the resolution providing for an inquiry into the right of the junior Senator from Delaware to retain his seat in the Senate and recited what I conceived to be the effect of certain evidence adduced before a subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, I fully appreciated the gravity of my action.

In common with all other Members of this body, I shall be glad, indeed, if a thorough investigation shall result in completely exculpating the Senator from all suspicion of wrongdoing. But I deemed it to be my solemn duty, in view of recent disclosures, to call for an investigation and to lay before the Senate the grounds and reasons for this demand.

If the investigation be had and the Senator from Delaware shall be justly exonerated, then the effect of the evidence already adduced will be rendered nugatory; but if an investigation be denied, or if a full hearing be prevented, then, justly, the conclusion will be drawn that those most intimately concerned stand in fear of the facts.

It is not my purpose now to argue this case, but simply to lay before the Senate in concrete form certain facts in an inquiry which was recently made.

On the 22d day of January, 1912, the President of the United States appointed Cornelius P. Swain United States marshal for the district of Delaware and sent said appointment to the Senate for confirmation.

I am not at liberty to disclose the proceedings of the executive sessions, but if the newspapers are to be trusted the committee exercised remarkable diligence and unusual alacrity in reporting the appointment favorably upon the very day it entered the Senate. But objections were made by some Senator, and the vote reconsidered and the appointment recommitted on January 23. The nomination was afterwards withdrawn by the President on February 13.

Prior to the withdrawal, and on February 2, there appeared before the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee Hon. Willard Saulsbury, representing certain objectors to the appointment. Cornelius P. Swain also appeared in person and by his attorney, Daniel O. Hastings.

Thereupon Mr. Saulsbury stated, among other things, as follows. I quote at some length from his remarks.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen: I will rehearse again what I have already informally stated to the members of the committee who are present, in the way of charges filed to the effect that Mr. Swain, the appointee, is an unfit and improper man to occupy any place connected with or near the courts of the United States for the district of Delaware. * * * The petition is based on the well-known reputation of the appointee in the district as a persistent violator of the criminal provisions of the Delaware constitution intended to secure purity of elections, and on certain specific violations of said provision hereafter mentioned. * * *

Further, Mr. Saulsbury charged:

Cornelius P. Swain has notoriously been a vote buyer in the second representative district of Sussex County (Northwest Fork Hundred) for many years. His reputation in this respect is a fact, as will be testified to by many persons of the greatest respectability in that community. * * * Specification 2: That on November 4, 1904, a Republican mass meeting was held at Dover, Del. After this meeting, at which Dr. Caleb R. Layton presided, and Robert H. Richards, Henry C. Conrad, and Walter H. Hayes spoke, an appointment was made with Col. du Pont's manager to meet a number of the old Addicks leaders at his, the manager's, office in Wilmington the next day, on Saturday, November 5, 1904. This appointment was made by a telephone call of one of the candidates on the State ticket, who had learned from the Addicks, or Union, Republicans that they were without money for the election. Addicks notified United States Senator Allee that he could not "make good" for election money. (This was on Thursday or Friday, November 3 or 4.) It was said that Col. du Pont's manager had blocked Addicks on getting his money in New York, and the Republicans were without money.

Mr. LODGE. May I ask the Senator from Missouri in what year this happened?

Mr. REED. This particular matter that the objector was then presenting related to 1904.

The candidate saw Senator Allee and told him he could put him, Allee, in the way of getting money if Addicks fell down. The candidate telephoned from Allee's store to Col. du Pont's manager in Wilmington, and made the appointment for the meeting next day, Saturday, November 5.

On Saturday, November 5, Senator Allee, Dr. R. C. Layton, Robert O. Houston, et al., went to Wilmington to Col. du Pont's manager's office, where they saw the colonel and his manager, and discussed how the money should be spent.

Enough paper money could not be had from the Wilmington banks to supply the demand, so there was a great amount of gold—in the neighborhood of fifty or sixty thousand dollars—divided there. It was understood that $10,000 more would be forthcoming on Monday.

C. P. Swain, now nominated for United States marshal, took his allotment for the second representative district of Sussex County (Northwest Fork Hundred) in gold coin $20 gold pieces, done up in bags, put it in a satchel and left for home. * * * Dr. George W. Marshall, of Milford, Del., was also present at the meeting, which was held at the office of Col. du Pont's manager in the Equitable Building.

When the additional $10,000 was to be given out on Monday the manager telephoned Senator Allee to come with the man who was to get it, as he, the manager, would not otherwise trust that man.

Swain took the $3,000 in gold to Bridgeville, Del., where he and his friends discussed what they should do with it for safe-keeping over Sunday.

The speaker then charged that the money was divided for safe-keeping over Sunday, and that on Monday morning, November 7, Newell Ball took the money to Philadelphia, had it changed into bills of convenient denomination, and divided it at the house of John T. Vandenburg, who was then a candidate for the legislature.

Mr. Saulsbury further charged that this money was delivered to political workers for the purchase of votes on the following day; that there was a carnival of election debauchery at that time in Northwest Fork Hundred; and that the money aforesaid was actually used on election day for the purchase of votes.

He charged that an office was opened in the harness room of H. P. Cannon's stable, where a cashier was established, and the money paid out for voters from that point.

He further charged:

Addicks got some money loosened up on Monday and furnished it to his lieutenants, who already had the du Pont money, and in that way "cut under" the Colonel (Mr. du Pont) and his manager; that is, Addicks's old crowd, and so produced the senatorial deadlock in 1905.

That the legislature thus elected met January 3, 1905, and adjourned March 23, 1905, without election of Senator; that a special session was called for May 31, 1905, the first vote taken on June 12, and Col. du Pont (now Senator du Pont) was elected June 13, 1906.

It will be observed that these charges were directed against the confirmation of the said Cornelius P. Swain; that the name and alleged action of the Senator from Delaware only came into the charges so far as his alleged acts related to the acts and character of Mr. Swain; that the charges were limited to the election of 1904, except that specification which declared Swain to be an unfit and improper man to occupy any place connected with or near the courts of the United States for the district of Delaware, and asserted him to be one who had notoriously been a vote buyer in the second representative district.

Thus the issue before the committee was narrowed to an examination of facts with which it could be shown Swain was personally connected and to his general reputation.

This was the construction placed upon the issues by the committee as is manifested by several rulings, to a few of which I call attention. The references to the pages following are to the typewritten transcript of the stenographer's notes.

At page 9 it appears that an objection was made by the attorney for Mr. Swain on the ground that the matter about to be disclosed did not concern Swain. The witness Owens started to answer, "Last fall a year ago, 1910, at the election," when he was interrupted by Senator SUTHERLAND with the statement:

Let me tell you in advance that you should not tell us anything that is not in any way connected with Mr. Swain, and unless it is in some manner connected with Mr. Swain there is no use to take up our time to relate it.

This ruling was made early in the proceedings, and, speaking generally, was adhered to throughout the investigation. Illustrations will be found at pages 101 and 107, where Senator SUTHERLAND made the express ruling:

We do not want to go into an investigation of general political conditions in Delaware. We want this testimony confined to Mr. Swain's participation in the matter, and we do not want to go over the whole field of what has happened in Delaware.

Another illustration will be found at page 136 and elsewhere in the record. A reading of the record will show that after these rulings were made the objectors confined themselves closely to those acts of irregularity and criminality with which Swain could be directly connected. This narrow boundary not only circumscribed the investigation made of the election of 1904, but the elections of 1908 and 1910.

I call attention to these rulings not for the purpose of criticizing the committee, but only that the Senate may understand the narrow limits within which this investigation was confined.

The objectors offered proof to show the general reputation of Mr. Swain at the time he was appointed. This proof was in the form of affidavits and testimony adduced upon the stand. In general terms, the following-named witnesses, viz, Phillip P. Jacobs, Charles Owens, William L. Gray, William B. Troitt, William H. Whitney, Minos E. Allen, George W. Wiley, Clayton S. Elliott, George P. Willen, Charles E. Russell, John G. Allen, Edward L. Kinder, Charles Owens, Fred L. Willey, George W. Willen, William I. Hubbard, and J. T. Russell, testified that Mr. Swain's general reputation was, and for years had been, that of a man who was at the head of the buying of votes and distributing the money to those who bought votes; that this reputation was open and notorious, some of the witnesses stating that it had been open and notorious for 25 years. It is but fair to say that a number of witnesses testified to the good reputation of Swain, among them two ministers of the gospel, one of whom did not live in the neighborhood. Some of these witnesses were members of the same local political organization as Swain. One of them admitted that he believed Swain had used money corruptly, while others admitted they had heard of Swain's reputation being called into question.

The conflict of testimony is, however, unimportant, in view of the undisputed fact to which I shall now refer, and the further fact that the undisputed evidence shows Swain's corrupt practices, in at least one important transaction, to have been pursuant to a plan devised in the office of the Senator from Delaware. Assuming the facts to be true, as shown by the undisputed evidence, it must therefore be taken as proven that the Senator from Delaware recommended Cornelius P. Swain for the important position of United States marshal with full knowledge of his corrupt practices.

I pause here long enough to remark that Swain, although present on the 2d of February and introducing much evidence at that time, did not take the stand in his own behalf; neither did he afterwards take the stand, although the hearing was adjourned from the 9th of February to the 13th of February for the express purpose of affording him that opportunity.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. I desire to say that the committee continued its hearings for Mr. Swain to give testimony, and when we met that morning we received word from the White House that Mr. Swain's name had been withdrawn. His counsel desired him to make a statement and we desired to hear him, but we had no jurisdiction, inasmuch as his name had been withdrawn.

Mr. REED. Very well. Then I take it the President, having heard of this evidence, decided the question of Swain's fitness for himself.

It is also important to consider that his appointment was withdrawn, and, so far as appears by the record, while he was under fire and without his protest.

I come now to consider that portion of the testimony which bears directly upon these charges and shows the relation of the Senator from Delaware to the practices complained of.

It is important to know that section 7 of article 5 of the constitution of the State of Delaware provides:

Every person who shall pay, promise to pay, transfer or deliver, contribute or offer to contribute, to be paid or used, any money or other valuable thing as an inducement or reward for the giving or withholding, or in any manner influencing the giving or withholding, of a vote at any general or special election, etc., shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and fined not less than $100 nor more than $5,000 or imprisoned for a term of not less than one month nor more than three years, or by both such fine and imprisonment, etc.

There is a further penalty that the person convicted shall lose his right of suffrage for 10 years.

The legislative act of 1903 fixes the statute of limitations at two years.

Whoever, therefore, has violated the provisions of the constitution aforesaid has placed himself in the class of felons and is liable, within the discretion of the court, to a penalty of three years' imprisonment and a fine of $5,000 and disfranchisement for 10 years. Such is the gravity of the acts to which I challenge attention.

The witnesses to whose testimony I now call attention were, I think, without exception, most unwilling witnesses, who testified only under compulsion.

It appears from the testimony that for several years there have been two factions in the Republican Party in the State of Delaware; one of them is the Union Republicans, or Addicks faction; the other is the Regular, or du Pont, faction.

The condition to which the Addicks faction had brought the State of Delaware is well described in the testimony of a witness for Swain, the Rev. Stephen M. Morgan, who refers to the Addicks faction as "the Addicks régime, that had corrupted the State there from top to bottom and from north to south." (Record, p. 67.)

Mr. Charles Owens testified that prior to the election of 1902 Swain represented what is known as the du Pont faction, or Regular Republicans. (Record, p. 26.) In 1902 S. H. Nelson was a candidate on the Republican ticket, and that Mr. Swain came to Mr. T. J. Gray, who appears to have represented the Democrats, and got them to nominate Nelson upon their ticket; that the Democrats assented to this because they could not elect a Democrat in that district, and that they hoped to beat the Union, or Addicks Republican, candidate. Swain said that he would furnish all the money that was needed, but that it did not make any difference, so that they carried their representative. The representative was what they (du Pont Republicans) wanted. The night before election he (Swain) came from Wilmington on one of the trains; that he arrived there about 9 o'clock and gave Mr. T. J. Gray some money, at least $150 (Record, p. 21); at this time Swain said that Mr. du Pont could not get all the money he expected to get—as much money as he expected to get—but that he would spare Mr. Gray, or "us," this quantity of money, which he gave him; he said the money was to buy votes with. He used the words "buy votes." (Record, p. 22.)

Swain was known as the buying manager of the vote buying, or manager of the floating element; Mr. Swain made himself very watchful with the floating element (Record, p. 28); the witness described a floater as a man who sells his vote. (Record, p. 30.)

The foregoing testimony is principally important in that it tends to show Swain's financial dealings with Senator du Pont at this early date.

Ex-United States Senator J. Frank Allee testified—and I shall quote a portion of his testimony in haec verba—that in the year 1904 he was the chairman of the Republican State committee of Delaware. He was asked to state the occurrences which led to a meeting in Wilmington, Del., a few days prior to the election of 1904, at which meeting Mr. Swain, among others, was present. (Record, p. 104.) It is interesting to note that at this point the attorney for Swain, who had theretofore been objecting to any testimony with respect to any meetings at which Swain was not shown to be present, arose and formally admitted that Swain took $3,000 from this meeting in Wilmington to Bridgeville. The manifest purpose of this admission was to halt the investigation with reference to this meeting. Senator SUTHERLAND, however, for the committee, rules that they would hear the witness. Ex-Senator Allee then stated in substance that he would confine his testimony to Mr. Swain's connection with the meeting. The record makes plain the purpose of the witness and counsel for Swain to prevent investigation of what took place at this meeting, and, manifestly, the story was but partly told. (Record, p. 105.)

Senators who are interested in knowing the exact state of the record will find it at page 105.

However, it appears that on Saturday preceding the election on Tuesday, a meeting was held in Wilmington, Del.; ex-Senator Allee, then State chairman, and certain other gentlemen were there to arrange for the conduct of the campaign; that Mr. Swain was in an adjoining room. The witness vehemently protested against being required to disclose anything with which Swain was not directly concerned, and such was the ruling of the committee (record, pp. 106-7), and I think the committee probably ruled correctly.

During this colloquy ex-Senator Allee stated:

If they do want generally what has happened there they had better issue a general subpoena for all people prominent in politics in Delaware. I was unfortunately chairman of the State committee, and I met people in that connection that I am sorry now I did meet politically. (Record, p. 107.) The men I met were the so-called du Pont or Regular Republican Party. I was with the so-called Union Republican Party (the Addicks faction). (Record, p. 108.)

This was a meeting of the political leaders of the State; it was brought about by the knowledge on the part of the people who furnished the money that Mr. Addicks at that time had not been able to furnish (record, p. 113); it appears that there had been a preliminary meeting, but the witness was not permitted or required to disclose what took place at this preliminary meeting.

Referring, however, to the second meeting, at which the money was divided, he testified—and now I quote his exact language—an appointment was made with me by Mr. Layton to meet two gentlemen in Wilmington. They were Henry A. and T. Coleman du Pont; that meeting was to discuss ways and means to conduct our campaign successfully.

Now, mark you, this was on Saturday immediately preceding the Tuesday on which the election was to be held.

I do not see where this has any bearing on the Swain end of this matter, but I may explain why I was there. I was there as State chairman, and when those arrangements had been concluded I referred the matter to Dr. Marshall, Dr. Layton, the chairmen of Kent County and Sussex County, and there my connection with the matter ceased. I, with Dr. Layton, made the arrangements with T. Coleman du Pont and HENRY A. DU PONT and then turned it over to what I would call people down the line—county chairmen and so on. (Record, p. 114.)

Referring to this same meeting, witness was asked whether any considerable amount of money was distributed (record, p. 109), and said:

My impression is it was over $25,000. I can not say the amount.

He further testified that a sum of money, admitted to be $3,000, was there turned over to Swain in the office of HENRY A. DU PONT; that this money was used for the purpose of securing the election of governor, the State ticket, and members of the legislature. (Record, p. 110.)

Witness testified that he could not state that the amount was between $50,000 and $60,000 (record, p. 114), that this division of money occurred on Saturday, that the election was held on Tuesday, and that while there were some Saturday night meetings to be held they were inexpensive.

Ex-Senator Allee further testified:

It seems rather hard, with a number of people at that meeting, that you should center on me and bring me here and try to get from me the amount of money contributed, when you have it in your own hands. Senator DU PONT is here, and you could call him at any minute and ask him what he knows about it. (Record, p. 117.)

Being asked whether he considered Swain a fit man to be made United States marshal, the witness said:

To answer your question frankly, I said in the newspapers that I saw no reason why Swain should not be confirmed; that if Senator DU PONT, who contributed the money, should be United States Senator and if Mr. Swain is only the common carrier to carry it to Sussex County, it is my judgment that Mr. Swain is fit to be United States marshal. (Record, p. 119.)

A little later the witness added:

Senator DU PONT recommends his appointment; it is on his recommendation that he is appointed.

It is manifest, Mr. President, from reading the testimony of this witness that all of the details with reference to raising this money, and the uses to which it was put, were eliminated from his testimony, except so far as Swain had immediate connection therewith, and it is perfectly manifest that if the testimony had been allowed to take a broad and general scope that this witness could have told of other agreements by which the du Pont faction was to furnish money and the terms upon which it was to be furnished.

It is further extremely probable that this witness could have told of the devices employed to prevent Addicks from securing money to be used in the election, to the end that the funds contributed at this meeting might constitute the balance of power between the contending factions and enable those who furnished it to control the legislature about to be elected. Much light is thrown upon this by the testimony of other witnesses, but I propose now to follow the $3,000 placed in the hands of Swain in the office of HENRY A. DU PONT to its ultimate corrupt distribution.

Newell Ball, an ex-member of the legislature, testified:

That during the week preceding the election of 1904 there was considerable uneasiness as to whether the munitions of war should be had. On Saturday night prior to the election of 1904 I, together with other gentlemen, met Mr. Swain on the arrival of the 6.10 train (from) Wilmington for the purpose of asking him what success he had had.

Now, that was the train which brought Swain from the office of HENRY A. DU PONT, where it was admitted $3,000 in gold was turned over to him. Continuing the testimony, I read:

His reply was, "Boys, I have got her." He said, "Where can we go?" One gentleman who was with me suggested that we adjourn to his house. We did so. Mr. Swain produced what he said was $3,000 in $20 gold pieces. It was put out on this gentleman's dining-room table. (Record, p. 121.) So far as my recollection goes, the first matter under discussion was as to what method we would proceed to follow to put that $3,000 in $20 gold pieces in usable form. It hardly seemed practicable to start out with material of that sort for the purpose for which was intended. Various methods were suggested of getting it converted into proper currency, but no method suggested seemed practicable until I suggested that I had a bank account in Philadelphia, and that my relations with the bank officers were very close personally, and that I could, if it was desired to do so by the representative of the voters of that district, who was Mr. Swain—he was a member of the county committee, if I am not mistaken—that I would take that $3,000 to Philadelphia; that I could take it into the private room of the bank to which I referred, and have it changed into the form in which we desired to have it.

After considerable discussion, it was decided that I be asked to do so, and I did so. (Record, p. 122.) That was on Saturday night. The question was suggested as to what disposition should be made of that gold, which you know is bulky, in the interim between Saturday night and Monday morning. They suggested various plans, but it was finally resolved into this: That I myself take to my home $2,000, and another gentleman who is now dead, and whose name I would prefer not to mention, took the other $1,000. I said, "Gentlemen, if I am to handle this, I want to be sure that you bring it to my house before train time, because I don't want to handle stuff of that sort around the station"; but he didn't do as he promised for some reason, and he gave it to me at the station. (Record, p. 123.)

This brings us to Sunday morning; and it appears that sometime on Sunday the custodian of this $1,000—probably because it was the Lord's day and in recognition of the principle that "the better the day the better the deed"—this guardian of the exchequer proceeded to purloin a portion of the trust fund that had been placed in his possession. When the fact was discovered by Mr. Swain, his righteous soul was wrought with grief, his noble spirit charged with agony, that any man born of woman could basely lay unholy hands upon the fund that had been set aside for the sacred purpose of purchasing votes; and although the man who had purloined the fund protested there was a debt due to him from the committee and that he had only paid himself an honest debt out of the corruption money, Swain refused to be swerved from the strict path of duty and sternly told the false custodian "That money is here to buy votes and it must not be touched." So they restored the fund to all of its original chastity and started on their way to Philadelphia to have it changed into "a convenient form."

I read the commonplace language of the witness:

After we got on the train—Mr. Swain and myself—he said, "You have got the $1,000?" I said, "Yes." He said, "Do you know that fellow took out a certain sum?" I said, "No; did he?" I said "I am sorry to hear that, because it will place me in a very embarrassing position with my bank connections." He said, "He took it out, but I made him put it back; I told him that that money was sent here to buy votes."

Mr. Swain said that this man claimed that he had a bill against the committee and that he had paid himself out of this amount; that was what Mr. Swain said. Mr. Swain went on to say, "I told him that that money was intended for the purpose of buying votes, and if he had any bill against the committee he should present his bill and it would be paid by private subscription." (Record, p. 124.)

Thus it appears that while there is honor among thieves, it does not always apply to election rogues. But Brother Swain intended that the highest kind of morals should be applied to this transaction, and he compelled a restoration of the fund.

I took the money to Philadelphia and had it changed into fives, tens, twos, and ones. (Record, p. 122.)

Before that time I had been asked to be treasurer of that fund—

Why, they have this system in Delaware down so fine that they run it under parliamentary rules and elect officers with due formality and solemnity.

Before that time—

Said the witness—

I had been asked to be treasurer of that fund and see that it was used for the purpose for which it was intended. Without having any very vivid recollection on the subject, I think I held that in my possession until the following day—election day—and I took it down to town and to the office which had been selected as my office as treasurer of that fund, where I was provided with a clerk and kept books; and that $3,000 was paid out in that way.

MR. SAULSBURY. Paid out for votes?

Mr. BALL. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. "For the purpose for which this money was intended," you said. Was it intended to purchase votes?

Mr. BALL. Yes; that was my understanding, and that was the purpose for which it was used.

Under protest the witness stated that the name of the clerk who kept the books and assisted him was Edward Hazard. (Record, p. 125.)

Mr. SAULSBURY. Where was this transaction had where he acted as clerk?

Mr. BALL. The office at that election was in a harness room belonging to Mr. H. P. Cannon's stable in Bridgeville. (Record, p. 126.)

The office, the vote-buying office, "at that election," indicating that there was a custom which had covered a period of years and that at other times other offices had been opened at which they kept sets of books. At this particular election, however, to which the investigation was confined, it was in Mr. H. P. Cannon's stable, in Bridgeville.

The witness testified that he had always been a Republican, and his father before him. (Record, p. 127.)

Asked by Senator SUTHERLAND how the money was distributed to the voters, the witness replied:

It has been quite a number of years since I was engaged in anything of that sort. As I said before, since then I have been in a good many different lines of business, and my memory is not very exact on it; but my impression is that certain active young men, who have the best interests of the party at heart—or, at least, who are anxious to reach success, no matter by what means—go out, and they find a man leaning against a fence who had not disposed of his vote and they dicker with him and make a bargain for whatever sum may be satisfactory to him; they take him in and vote him, or by some method satisfy themselves that they get what they pay for. Workers bring their men into the treasurer's office and say, "I agreed to give John Jones five, ten, fifteen, or whatever it may be," and that is paid if they have voted according to the agreement, and the book is kept, "John Jones, by William Smith, $10," and so on.

Why, it appears, sir, that they have the system of vote selling and vote buying reduced to about the same point where it is conducted much as are public sales by auction. They have clerks, they keep books, they have offices. When they refer to the purchase of voters they use the very terms they would employ if they were referring to ordinary sales of merchandise.

Notice the expression, "Find a man who has not yet disposed of his vote." Notice the other expression, "If they get what they bought." And throughout this record you will find there is a language of fraud. There is a vocabulary of corruption which is applied with the same laconic indifference we display when we use ordinary commercial terms at the stock yards if we are buying cattle or bartering in hogs.

After the testimony which I have just read was given, Senator SUTHERLAND inquired, with a maidenlike innocence that was refreshing and an astonishment that appears to have been genuine:

And the voter understands that he is to vote in a particular way for that sum of money?

Mr. BALL—

Mr. Ball's answer left no room for doubt he was himself a business man representing business men, who had introduced business methods into politics. Doubtless he felt rather piqued at the intimation of doubt expressed in the question. Here is the answer:

Well, Senator, I don't think that they usually trust an understanding. It is customary to follow some sort of method to be certain—that the goods for which the money is paid are delivered. There are various methods of satisfying themselves as to that. (Record, p. 127.)

Notice the commercial phrase—

Senator OVERMAN inquired whether Swain was on this occasion active in bribing voters himself or did he do it through his lieutenants. The witness replied:

I don't believe I can answer that question; I was closely confined to my duties in this office as treasurer, and I was not outside. I really don't know what Mr. Swain did. Possibly if the books had been kept and could be produced they would indicate.

The witness testified there were between 400 and 500 floaters in that district; that the whole $3,000 was spent that day for the purpose of buying their votes. (Record, p. 129.) His impression was that an additional thousand dollars was also expended; that there were purchased by the moneys on hand that day from 350 to 400 votes—practically the entire floating vote. That there was paid about $10 for each vote. (Record, p. 130.)

This witness belonged to the Addicks branch of the Republican faction. It appears that Swain, representing the du Pont faction, procured this money in du Pont's office, and turned it over to Ball, of the Addicks faction, who acted as treasurer, kept the books, and paid out the money. (Record, p. 131.)

The witness further testified:

I think I am safe in saying that there have been large sums of money spent there since 1908, since the passage of the election law. * * * Every election, it is the general belief, that they (the floaters) will sell their votes. (Record, p. 132.)

The witness, however, only gave this as his general impression. (Record, pp. 132 and 134.)

that various methods have been produced to satisfy the purchaser that he gets the goods he pays for. That so far as his own slight knowledge and experience go, the most satisfactory method has been to provide the voters assistants * * * and to provide him with a number of buttons, which is his certificate, and which entitled him to the sum agreed upon by the worker. (Record, p. 135.)

Mr. Salsbury sought to show when these buttons were used, but was not permitted to do so, because he could not state that could show Mr. Swain's connection therewith. (Record, p. 136.) Neither was the witness permitted to tell where the additional thousand dollars came from which was furnished for use at this election. (Record, p. 137.)

I here make the suggestion that it may be very interesting to follow that thousand dollars and learn where it came from, and it may be very interesting to inquire how these buttons were distributed by the voters' assistant.

I pause long enough at this time to say that the record sufficiently discloses what a "voters' assistant" is under the laws of the State of Delaware. He is a man who is permitted to go into the booth to "assist the voter" in casting his vote; and it is through the voters' assistant scoundrels make sure that the poor wretch who sells his honor and betrays his country and makes of himself a criminal has in fact done so. It is through the voters' assistant that the button is delivered to the miserable wretch, which is at once his certificate that he has betrayed his country, his conscience, his honor, and his God, and that he is entitled to his share of the bribe money at the office of the treasurer of the corruption fund.

I pass to another witness.

John T. Vandenburg testified that he saw the package containing the money brought by Swain; that it was carried to his house; he corroborated Ball's testimony with reference to the division of the money. He, however, denies guilty knowledge.

This Mr. Vandenburg was the Union Republican candidate for the legislature at that time. He evidently sought to avoid the admission of criminal responsibility in the transaction, and in a painful manner undertook to avoid the cross-questioning of Senator SUTHERLAND by saying that the money might have been used to hire workers at $10 per day. It is perfectly manifest, however, that this witness was merely dodging. This, however, is immaterial in view of the positive testimony that money was actually used in bribing voters. (Record, pp. 144 to 153.)

Other testimony was given of a corroborative nature. All the foregoing evidence with relation to the election of 1904 stands undenied in the record. Not one syllable of it is challenged by a living witness, although Swain was present with an able attorney and was here at the threshold of his own State where witnesses were accessible. If, then, this testimony is to be taken as true, HENRY A. DU PONT, upon the very eve of the election of 1904, contributed the sum of $25,000 to be used on election day, and $3,000 of this sum was followed to its ultimate disposition and was shown to have been used in the wholesale scheme of bribery. This money was used in part to secure the election of a member of the legislature.

The evidence is sufficient to warrant the conclusion that the use of this money resulted in returning to the legislature men who were committed to HENRY A. DU PONT. It is a matter of public history, and was charged at this hearing, that a legislative deadlock occurred between the Addicks and du Pont factions, but that finally HENRY A. DU PONT was, on the 13th day of June, 1906, sent to the United States Senate by the votes of members of the legislature, a number of whom, at least, were elected by these corrupt practices, and with du Pont money.

The evidence undoubtedly did not disclose the entire amount of money contributed, because it was circumscribed to meet the limits of the particular investigation; but if we limit ourselves to the proof actually adduced, more than $25,000 was in fact contributed. The magnitude of this fund can only be appreciated by Senators from large and populous States when I say there are but three counties in the State of Delaware and that its total voting population, as indicated in this record, does not exceed approximately 42,000. Why, there are 20,000 more voters than that in the little western city in which I reside. In this small State $25,000, and probably $60,000, was distributed. The magnitude of the fund under these circumstances ought to be appreciated. If a similar amount of money per voter were to be distributed in the State of New York or in any other of the large States it would shock the conscience of the American people, as indeed the expenditure of any sum of money for corrupt purposes ought to shock the conscience, and does shock the conscience of every decent man in this Republic.

I come now to consider the evidence so far as it discloses irregularities in subsequent elections. As a result of the election of 1904 HENRY A. DU PONT took his seat in the United States Senate. There came after that the elections of 1906, 1908, and 1910, and the legislature elected in 1910 returned him once more to his seat in this body.

As to this branch of the testimony, I intend to deal with great frankness and to lay it before the Senate for just what it is worth. Mark you, this investigation was all the time limited to Swain, and when Swain's connection could not be shown there the investigation halted. I say again I am not repeating this to criticize the committee, because I think they properly kept within the bounds they set; but it is important to understand that these limitations were fixed to the end that we may know that the disclosures here are but of the most partial character.

It appears that Mr. Swain, the trusted agent, if the testimony is to be believed, of the du Pont forces, did not cease his political activities in the field of vote buying when the polls closed in November, 1904. He was still a faithful laborer in the du Pont vineyard. Let us again refer to the record:

W. A. Draper testified that he resided at the town of Bridgeville and had been tax collector there; that he was present at a meeting at Mr. Swain's house just prior to the election of 1908. (Record, p. 156.) At this meeting Mr. Reese Layton, Thomas Ake, John Dimes, and others were present.

Mr. Swain had a list there to draw off names to deliver to certain ones to look after the day of election. This was a meeting of the political workers of that precinct or hundred. These gentlemen had sheets of paper and were taking down certain names to look after (record, p. 157); that as the names were called off Swain would occasionally say, "I will take that one myself," and other names were assigned to different political workers. These were the names of men known as floaters. "By floaters, I mean the purchasable element among the voters; floaters is the name they go by." (Record, p. 158.) Mr. Swain did not mention any money to be paid to these voters.

Then the witness was asked what Swain did do, and this was his reply:

He held up his hand, and he said, "That much for the colored ones [witness holding up one hand and extending his fingers] and that much for the white ones [witness holding up both hands and extending his fingers]. That meant $5 and $10, the way I understood it—$5 for the colored voters and $10 for the white voters."

Mr. Swain is at the head of the political organization in that hundred, as I understand it. I am a Republican. (Record, p. 159.)

Incidentally, this witness testified that at a previous election, when Swain was himself a candidate for the legislature against Layton, Swain had offered witness's own father $20 for his vote. (Record, p. 160.)

The witness stated that at this meeting in 1908 he took a list of voters. He was asked if he made any agreements with the voters to pay them for their votes. He protested that he had not been subpoenaed to answer that question, and when informed by Senator SUTHERLAND that he could not be compelled to incriminate himself, if, in his judgment, the answer would incriminate him, witness refused to answer. (Record, p. 161.) Witness, however, testified that he received money after the election to pay off his voters, and that the money he received was $80 (record, p. 164); that this amount corresponded with the sheet which had been given him before the election; that at the meeting Cornelius Swain had said, "Bring in your list after election of the men you have bought," and that he would see that we were taken care of. (Record, p. 165.)

It appears that something had occurred which alarmed this band of rogues at this time; they did not proceed so boldly; they did not have an open office for buying votes; they did not set up a bookkeeper to keep tally. They had now arranged to divide the voters out by means of lists and to make agreements by word of mouth with the voters. The voter had to trust to their honor afterwards for payment, and the payments were made subsequent to the election, each man bringing in his list of the men he had bought, and the money was then paid through the instrumentality of Mr. Swain or his associates.

Robert Reese Layton testified that he attended the meeting at Swain's house in 1908; that he was called there, as was customary in that district, to ascertain the number of purchasable votes, or number of straight votes, or number of colored people, or number of white people, or number of Democrats, or to analyze the lists.

I presume that was one object of the meeting. (Record, p. 169.)

That the lists were analyzed, and different ones would take different names. They would read off a man's name, and as a man's name was read out different people would condescend to look after these people on election day. (Record, p. 170.)

Note the language:

Different people would condescend to look after those people on election day.

Senator SUTHERLAND asked him the following question:

I understand you to say that you understood something of the subject of the votes being purchased. What do you mean by that?

Mr. LAYTON. Well, that was the object of the meeting.

Senator SUTHERLAND. How do you know that?

Mr. LAYTON. That is why I went there.

Senator SUTHERLAND. That was the thing operating in your mind?

Mr. LAYTON. Yes. (Record, p. 171.)

Further on witness testified that when the different ones took the list of names the object of that was to purchase the votes. (Record, p. 172.)

Witness was asked whether he took a list at this meeting, and answered, "I don't like to specifically state." He was further asked whether he received any money at that time, or afterwards, in connection with the election. He answered, "I don't especially want to answer that." (Record, p. 174.) His attention being directed to the fact that the two-year statute of limitations avoided any prosecution, witness stated, "Well, I don't care to be published all over the State as being implicated in buying votes." (Record, p. 175.)

Again, on page 176, witness declined to state whether he had received any money at this meeting for the purpose of buying votes.

The foregoing evidence with reference to the election of 1908.

This brings us to the election of 1910. Frank M. Jones was the deputy attorney general in Sussex County, Del. He testified that in the performance of his duty he undertook to investigate certain election matters in Northwest Fork Hundred at the election of 1910. Under the law he is authorized to summon witnesses before him and take their affidavits. He produced before the committee various affidavits relating to that election.

But again, while his examination had extended, at least we are warranted in inferring, throughout the State, his testimony was confined to his investigation of Swain's corruption. Therefore we are narrowed again to an investigation simply of the Bridgeville voting precinct, and to that alone.

One of these affidavits was that of Samuel Scott, and I think if the Senate will bear with me I will read that affidavit:

Samuel Scott, of North West Fork Hundred, Sussex County, and State of Delaware, being duly sworn on the Holy Evangelists of the Almighty God by Frank M. Jones, deputy attorney general of the State of Delaware for Sussex County, deposes and says as follows:

William J. Swain saw me down near the railroad station in Bridgeville on Saturday before the last election, November 5 of the present year, and he says to me, "Sam, ain't you going to help us at the election?" and I says, "Will, I don't see how I can, for I have got to carry my potatoes to the potato house." And he says, "For God's sake get out and help us and you shall be well paid for it." I don't know as I made him any answer, but went on home.

I went out and did some work for the Republican Party that afternoon, but made no promises to the voters as to the amount of money they would get, as I had not been told how much to promise. I don't think I saw Mr. Swain any more until the following Monday night, the night before the election, when I walked down to Mr. John Dimes's store—and I saw Mr. "Nell" Swain right in front of the store. He walked up to me and put his hand on my shoulder and he says to me, "What do you know?" I says to him, "I don't know much"; and he says, "What do you mean by not knowing much?" I don't believe I answered him; and then he says to me, "Whatever information you want, get it from Will Swain or John Dimes." I hung around waiting for Will, and after awhile he came to the store, and I says to him, "Will, what are you going to do?" And he whispered to me, "Sam, you can promise $10." That was all that was said then, and I went home. Election morning I came down town and met Mr. Cornelius P. Swain on the corner by Sudler Bros. store. We talked awhile, and I says, "Say, Mr. Swain, are you back of these boys—what they tell me?" He says, "Who?" I says, "Will Swain and John Dimes." He put his hand on my shoulder and says, "I am. I would sell my house and lot but what I would back up what they say. Go ahead and do what they say." Then I went to knocking around to see the boys. I did not hunt any votes that day—just merely stood around in a position so that them I had seen Saturday could see me. All the men I had seen on Saturday, except one, came to me.

Dimes was the man concerned in the elections of 1908, and the same crowd are operating now in 1910—

They would come to me and whisper and say, "What can you do?" And I told them to get Mr. Will Swain to mark their tickets and I would see that they got $10 apiece. I saw George Polk, colored; William Dashiells, colored; James Hastings; Michael Hastings; John Donovan; William Brumble, colored; Jacob Todd; Thomas Todd; William Walls; Charles H. Walls; and Frank Rickards.

I put the names down on my book as I saw each man. After the polls had closed I gave my book to Mr. Jim Todd and asked him to give it to Mr. John Dimes to hand it to Mr. Will Swain. Wednesday night I came down to Mr. Dimes's store and Mr. Swain was there. He had my book with the names, and we went over it together and checked off the names, and when we came to the name of a colored man Mr. Swain said they were paying them off with $5. There were eight white men at $10 apiece and three colored men at $5 apiece, making $95. Mr. Swain says, "Sam, what will satisfy you for your work?" I says, "O, anything you say will be satisfactory to me." He then made a figure 10 and asked me if that would do. I said, "Yes." That made a hundred and five dollars. Mr. Will Swain drew a roll of money out of his pocket and counted out some and laid it down on the counter behind the water cooler, and says to Mr. Dimes, "Here, John, count that." Mr. Dimes got up out of his chair walked across and counted it, and says, "There's a hundred and five." Will says, "That's right." Then Mr. Dimes put it down on the counter and I picked it up, rolled it together, and stuck it in my hip pocket. I did not look at it or count it at that time. I brought the same roll down to Mr. George W. Willin's house last night, counted it, and marked each bill. I marked one of them "Samuel Scott" and all the others I marked "S. Scott." They were all $5 bills. There were 21 of them. After I marked them I put them all in an envelope and sealed them up. When this money was paid over to me Mr. Horace Sudler was in the store and within a few feet of me. Mr. Will Dimes was also there and not many feet away. Mr. Russell Short was also in the store and very close to us.

This affidavit was subscribed and sworn to on the 12th day of November, 1910.

It appears from all the evidence, which I will not take time to read, that the deputy attorney general of the State was advised of this transaction and that these bills were marked under his direction.

On a later date, the 22d of November, this man makes another affidavit:

Samuel Scott, being first duly sworn according to law, deposes and says as follows:

Frank Rickards, one of the men I promised $10 to vote the Republican ticket on last election day, came to my house last Tuesday night, November 15, 1910, and I paid him the $10 in my wagon house. This was about 7 o'clock in the evening. I paid him two $5 bills. He took the money and left. The same night I paid Mr. James Hastings the $10 I had promised him for voting the Republican ticket. I paid him two $5 bills at the same place. I should judge it was about half past 7 when I paid him—in the evening. This was Tuesday night, the day the law was off for shooting. The same night I paid John Donovan the $10 I had promised him for voting the Republican ticket. I gave him two $5 bills in the same place, in my wagon house, immediately after I had paid Mr. Hastings.

I then paid Michael Hastings the $10 I had promised him. I gave him two $5 bills also, at the same place, right after I had paid Mr. Donovan. These three men drove up to my house together in a buggy, but I did not pay any one of the three in the presence of either of the others. There was a lighted lantern in my wagon house at the time I gave these men the money.

I will not read the rest of the affidavit; but it goes on and discloses where he paid out every dollar of this money to these 11 roughish gentlemen who had been selling their rights as American citizens.

The evidence discloses, Mr. President, that there were some prosecutions thereafter, but only one or two of these men were convicted. I believe one or two ran away, and if we are to credit the facts sworn to we may well ask whether the leprosy of corruption has spread itself into the very temples of justice of the State of Delaware, because such things as these can not be and long continue where there are courts that honestly administer the law. They appear to have long continued in that State.

The affidavits that were filed, while they are limited as to the territory they cover, nevertheless disclose the fact that the same system of corruption existed in 1910 that existed in 1904. The affidavits and the testimony disclose the fact that in 1902 Swain was the trusted agent of the du Pont faction. In 1904 we trace Swain to the very office of the Senator from Delaware and there show the distribution of this large sum of money.

We trace $3,000 of it down until it actually passes into the corrupt hands of the voters through the foul hands of Swain. We trace this money again in 1908, where a certain set of gentlemen are operating through Mr. Swain, and we find Mr. Swain in 1908 returning with the money from the town in which the Senator from Delaware keeps his office, and from the very town where the money was distributed in 1904. We trace again the corrupt use of the money in 1910 by the same corrupt agent.

The investigation was narrowed to Swain, always to Swain; never beyond the skirts of Swain's garments could the witnesses or the investigators go. I say again I do not criticize the committee for that. I think their ruling was the correct ruling of lawyers trying a particular matter, but as we confront this question as Senators we must look at it in its broader light, and we must know that not all of the corruption took place through the hands of Mr. Swain, and we must know as Senators that it is our duty to look further.

I challenge your attention to this fact, that if this testimony is true—God knows I hope and pray it is not true; I hope it for the sake of the State of Delaware; I hope it for the sake of the Senator from that State; I hope it for the sake of this body that ought not to be defiled by any improper conduct—but if it be true, then we are forced to the inevitable conclusion that the Senator from Delaware knew that his man Swain's hands were covered with the slime of corruption; that for 25 years he had been a defiler of the electorate of his State; that for a quarter of a century he had been a sapper and miner, digging beneath the citadels of Delaware, beneath the foundation of our civilization; and yet, nevertheless, he causes his name to be sent to this body that we may put the insignia of our approval upon the name of a man of that kind. To recommend that such a man as this should be put close to the courts of Delaware, put into the very halls of justice, given the authority to stand within the shadow of the figure of equity, to recommend that this vote buyer, this corruptionist, to be put in charge of juries and of witnesses is an offense against the Senate. If the Senator from Delaware did this, and did it knowingly, then he is not worthy of a place in this body. If any Senator has done that and that alone, then he is guilty of an act that calls loudly upon this body to vindicate its honor and to protect the credit of the American people. If these witnesses have testified falsely, then let it be shown before a committee of the Senate, and if vindication shall come and the hands of the Senator from Delaware shall be found to be clean, I shall gladly lift my voice to cheer that result. But, sir, if this evidence is true, you can not ignore it and preserve the chastity and the integrity of the United States Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Idaho to refer the resolution to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. REED. I beg the Chair's pardon, but I made a motion not to refer the resolution to a committee, but that the resolution be adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. But in the face of a motion to refer that motion could not be made.

Mr. REED. My motion was made before the motion to refer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That would not make any difference. A motion to refer to a committee would have precedence over a motion for the adoption of any resolution.

Mr. REED. Let me state it to the Chair, and if I am wrong I shall be content. The resolution before the Senate in itself calls for an investigation by the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I made a motion to adopt that resolution. That motion was pending. Now, if the Chair rules that a motion to refer it to the committee, without permitting a vote upon my motion, is correct, I shall be content, if that is the parliamentary situation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is now obliged to announce that the hour of 4 o'clock having arrived, the resolution goes to the calendar.

PUBLIC UTILITIES COMMISSION.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 3812) to regulate public utilities in the District of Columbia and to confer upon the Commissioners of the District of Columbia the duties and powers of a public utilities commission.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside, giving notice at the same time that when the unfinished business is again reached I shall press for its consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside? The Chair hears none.

SENATOR FROM WISCONSIN.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 299, which is a question of the highest privilege.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will announce the question of privilege which is called up by the Senator from Idaho.

The SECRETARY. Order of Business 299, Senate resolution 136, a resolution directing the Committee on Privileges and Elections to investigate certain charges relative to the election of ISAAC STEPHENSON.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is the motion of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. It stands on my motion that the report of the committee be adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; that is the pending question.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho has the floor, if he desires to occupy it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to occupy it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. HEYBURN. For the purpose of stating his purpose.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I want to make a parliamentary inquiry. Do I understand that the so-called Stephenson resolution comes up as a matter of right, without the question of its consideration being submitted to the Senate for a vote?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Oh, yes; it is a matter of the highest privilege. It can be called up, and is called up as a matter of the highest privilege.

Mr. POINDEXTER. And it is considered by the Senate regardless of any action the Senate may wish to take?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is up. The Senate can dispose of it after it is up. It is up as a matter of privilege.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I feel it a duty, having charge of this measure, to press it for consideration. It involves the right of a Member of this body to his seat in this body as a Senator. There can be no more important question. A few days since I made a general statement intended to present the question to the Senate. I now desire more specifically and very briefly to present the questions involved.

The question is whether or not in the election of Senator STEPHENSON by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin there were used corrupt methods. There are certain conceded facts that should be stated as a premise to anything that may be said. It is admitted that the Legislature of Wisconsin on the 26th day of January, 1909, entered upon the performance of its constitutional duty to elect a Senator from that State to this body.

The law is specific and definite as to what shall occur at that time. It is conceded that the legislature was organized prior to that date and was in a position to perform this duty. The statute of the United States reads as follows, referring to the election of Senators:

SEC. 15. Such election shall be conducted in the following manner: Each house shall openly, by a viva voce vote of each member present, name one person for Senator in Congress from such State, and the name of the person so voted for who receives a majority of the whole number of votes cast in each house shall be entered on the journal of that house by the clerk or secretary thereof; or if either house fails to give such majority to any person on that day, the fact shall be entered on the journal. At 12 o'clock meridian of the day following that on which proceedings are required to take place as aforesaid the members of the two houses shall convene in joint assembly, and the journal of each house shall then be read, and if the same person has received a majority of all the votes in each house he shall be declared duly elected Senator.

On the 26th day of January, 1909, a vote was taken on the election of a United States Senator, each house voting separately. In the senate Mr. STEPHENSON received a majority of all the votes cast. On the same day, in the house, Mr. STEPHENSON received a majority of all the votes cast. Pursuant to the provisions of the act of Congress, on Wednesday, January 27, being the next day, at noon, the two houses met in joint convention. The lieutenant-governor presiding, stated—I call attention to his statement—

Gentlemen of the joint convention, you are assembled here for the purpose of expressing your choice for United States Senator. In order to comply with the Federal law the clerk of the senate and the clerk of the assembly will read from the journal of each house, respectively, the proceedings of the preceding day with reference to the election of a United States Senator.

That was entirely regular and in conformity with the statute.

The chief clerk of the senate read the journal of the senate of January 26, 1909, and the chief clerk of the assembly read the journal of the assembly of January 26, 1909.

In each case it appeared from the reading of the journal that ISAAC STEPHENSON had received a majority of all the votes cast. The statute says that it is the duty of the presiding officer to declare the party receiving the majority of the votes in each house to be elected a Senator. The presiding officer failed in the performance of that duty, notwithstanding the records clearly disclosed the facts that Mr. STEPHENSON had received a majority of all the votes cast.

It is contended by some that the failure of the presiding officer to announce the election of ISAAC STEPHENSON prevented the statute from operating in favor of his election. The announcement of the result of that vote was purely an administrative or executive act on the part of the presiding officer. It can not for a moment be accepted as a fact that the failure of that officer to perform his duty could in any way affect the validity of the election, because it is determined not by a vote in the joint meeting of the two houses, but it is declared by the disclosure of the record that ISAAC STEPHENSON received the majority of all the votes cast in each house.

I submit as an inevitable conclusion that his election was complete, whether or not the presiding officer should perform his duty. Otherwise it would rest within the power of a presiding officer to defeat the will of the legislature, and such a condition was never contemplated by those who enacted the statute under which Senators are elected.

I contend that on the day of the meeting of the two houses in joint session ISAAC STEPHENSON was elected a Senator from the State of Wisconsin to the United States Senate, regardless of the failure of the presiding officer to declare the result. The declaration of the result is not made any part of the election of the Senator. He had been elected in each house, and the purpose of the joint assembly's action was only to declare that fact. That fact being shown by the reading of the records, then ISAAC STEPHENSON'S election was complete.

Now, Mr. President, for some reason, known, perhaps, only to those who participated in it, there was this attempt to defeat the will of the Legislature of Wisconsin, so that by withholding the announcement they could render nugatory the action of the two houses of the legislature. I do not believe that any Senator in this body would be willing to subscribe to such a doctrine. It makes some difference whether or not ISAAC STEPHENSON was elected a Senator on the 27th day of January or on the 4th day of March. Regardless of the statute of the United States the presiding officer failed to make the announcement, and proceeded to call for the vote of the members of the legislature comprising the joint meeting of the two houses. They continued to vote upon that question, which had been already settled, until the 4th day of March. At no time between the 27th day of January and the 4th day of March did any person receive a majority of the votes of the two houses in joint meeting. It was not necessary that he should, but it seems that there was an acquiescence, which could not defeat the statute. There was an acquiescence in this procedure until the 4th day of March, and on that day ISAAC STEPHENSON received a majority of all of the members voting in this continuous joint meeting of the two houses.

He was elected on the 27th of January. If we were to concede that that election was not complete, then he was elected beyond controversy on the 4th day of March. It will probably be necessary for Senators voting upon this question to arrive at a conclusion in regard to that matter—that is, as to whether or not the election was complete when the record of the two houses voting in separate session was read in the joint session of the two houses. But whatever their conclusion in that regard may be, they must conclude from the record, and it is not denied that the record speaks truly that he was elected on the 4th day of March.

Now, the charges of corruption in regard to the election on the 4th day of March consist in the contention that upon that day the absence of three members of that joint assembly was brought about by corrupt means; that is to say, that they were bribed to absent themselves upon that day in order that the balance of the contention or controversy might result differently than it would have resulted had they been present.

There were three members absent on that day. Had they been present the vote might have been a tie; it might not. Those members, in regard to whom the charge is made, were Mr. Farrell, a Democrat; Mr. Ramsey, a Democrat; and Mr. Towne, a Democrat. It is contended that had those three men been present the 65 votes received by Mr. STEPHENSON would not have constituted a majority, and, I repeat, it is charged that their absence was procured by fraud and corruption. The facts disclosed by the record—and I think no one will have the temerity to question those facts—are that Mr. Ramsey was paired with a Republican member who had been ill for some weeks and was confined to his home away from the capital; that Mr. Farrell, as he said under oath, had grown tired of the controversy between Republican factions and voluntarily absented himself; and that Mr. Towne, for similar reasons, absented himself.

Now, unless you impeach the pair of Mr. Ramsey the result would still have been the same, because had Mr. Farrell and Mr. Towne both been present then Mr. STEPHENSON would still have had a majority of all the members present and voting.

Mr. Ramsey is dead, but testimony that can not be controverted was introduced and is in the record showing that he procured this pair through a party entirely disassociated with the controversy and, therefore, had he remained in the chamber he could not have voted. Pairs were recognized in the Legislature of Wisconsin on the vote for Senator all through the record of the proceedings.

We were to admit that the absence of Farrell and Towne was procured by some one other than Mr. STEPHENSON, by bribery or any other corrupt means, we would still have to concede the election of Mr. STEPHENSON, because their presence would not have changed the result; and unless you can successfully impeach the pair of Mr. Ramsey, even conceding that Mr. STEPHENSON had not been elected on the 27th of January, we must concede that he received a majority of all the votes cast in that joint session on the 4th of March. If corruption had been attempted and had resulted in securing the absence of Towne and Farrell, then it would not have affected the result. Now, that states it as the record states it and as it will not be controverted on this floor.

The testimony introduced disclosed the fact that no corruption was used; that those men absented themselves in order to be rid of an annoying condition, recognizing the fact that it was a controversy between factions of a party and not between two political parties.

Mr. President, the next charge is that Mr. STEPHENSON, acting through others, bribed or attempted to bribe members of the legislature. The testimony utterly failed to establish it. They came before the committee with an exaggerated statement that one hundred or two hundred thousand dollars, or varying sums—always in large figures—had been used for the purpose of attempting to corrupt the legislature.

The testimony utterly failed to establish any such condition. The men who were charged with knowledge of the alleged fact were brought before the committee and utterly failed to substantiate that charge. They charged that one Mr. Hines had been instrumental in attempting to bribe the legislature. The testimony absolutely annihilated that charge. It was shown that no offer had been made and that no attempt had been made to influence the legislature through Mr. Hines or any other person.

At one stage of the proceeding it was charged that there was a meeting in Milwaukee where it was planned to bribe these three absent members. A witness had testified before the legislative committee that he looked over the window transom into a room and saw these members, alleged to have been bribed, receive money at the hands of one Mr. Regan. Even that committee refused, after an investigation of the premises, to attach any importance to it, because it was disclosed that there was no transom over the door in the room, and that no single fact claimed by that witness had any foundation whatever. He was afterwards indicted for perjury for swearing to that statement and convicted, and is serving his sentence under that judgment of conviction.

Now, so much for the charge of corruption in the legislature.

Mr. SWANSON. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly; at any time.

Mr. SWANSON. Was there any reason given why the presiding officer of the joint assembly failed to announce the election which had been held the previous day?

Mr. HEYBURN. There was no explanation of that.

Mr. SWANSON. As to whether it had been done negligently or willfully?

Mr. HEYBURN. It was simply done without any explanation. There was a contention that members of the assembly present and not voting should be counted in order to determine whether or not the votes cast for Mr. STEPHENSON constituted a majority. I think no one will be troubled with that controversy, however, because the legislature was convened in regular session, a constitutional quorum was present, and out of that constitutional quorum the result was obtained. Members who refused to vote or absented themselves from the chamber did not succeed in effecting the purpose, if they had one.

Now, Mr. President, that leaves Senator STEPHENSON on the record the duly elected Senator from that State. This Senate would not allow any person to take advantage of his own wrong act. Mr. STEPHENSON having received that majority could not be defeated of the purpose of the election by a failure of the presiding officer to announce the next day a result where the law placed the responsibility upon him.

During the campaign between the primaries and the general election it is not charged that Mr. STEPHENSON was guilty of any act of corruption. He contributed to the State campaign fund the sum of $2,000 for the general purposes and expenses of the campaign. Others did the same, or rather contributed in other amounts. So the record between the primary and the general election at which the legislature was elected is absolutely clean. The record between the time of the election of the legislature and the election of the Senator, either on January 27 or March 4, whichever you choose to accept, is absolutely clear and clean of any charge of fraud. If any was attempted it was fruitless; it did not affect and could not affect the election.

Now we come to the third ground urged against the validity of his election, and that is the primary election. In Wisconsin they have undertaken to circumvent the Constitution of the United States by providing that a candidate for the United States Senate in that State must be nominated at a primary election. Mr. STEPHENSON received a very large vote of those cast at the primary. I contend that it is immaterial whether he did or did not receive a majority of them; that it was only a straw vote, there being no law authorizing such a primary. It is not competent under the Constitution as it is at present for a primary election to determine the question of the election of a United States Senator. A candidate may subject himself or submit himself to the people for the purpose of determining whether or not a majority of the votes cast at a primary election shall recommend him to the legislature, but it can not in any way control the action of the legislature, because under the Constitution of the United States it is the legislature that elects. The question before this body is not, Was Senator STEPHENSON nominated to the United States Senate, or as a candidate for the United States Senate before the legislature, but the question before this body is, Was he elected by the legislature? The legislature would not be bound in any manner or to any extent to elect the man who had received the most votes at the direct primary, because it is not a ballot recognized by the law of the United States or by the Constitution. It is not the electorate that elect a Senator, but the legislature. So I repeat that the legislature might disregard entirely the question as to who received a majority of the votes at a primary or as to whether or not the primaries were conducted in conformity with the laws of the State or with any law or rule that might be invoked in the matter.

Mr. STEPHENSON, however, received a majority of the votes at the primary election—a large majority—and the question that gave the committee some, not concern, but some reason for inquiring into the manner of conducting that primary never seemed to me to be a serious question at all. There is no such proceeding known as the nomination of a United States Senator except before the legislature itself. There can be no such thing as candidacy for the United States Senate except before the legislature. You may call a man a candidate because, forsooth, he goes out among the constituents and asks them to vote for him and says, "I am going to be a candidate"; but the word "candidacy" has no place in the consideration of this question, because, I repeat, there is no such thing as being a candidate for the United States Senate before any body or at any place other than in the legislature. The legislature was entirely at liberty to select a Senator regardless of the result of the primaries; it was at liberty to select a Senator who had not been before the primaries or whose name had not been mentioned before the meeting of the legislature at which the responsible action was to be taken. Therefore, I want to get rid of this question of candidate and candidacy in the beginning, as it only tends to confuse the issue.

Mr. President, this statement covers the proceedings properly subject to the consideration of this body at this time. First, was the legislature a legally organized body meeting pursuant to and in conformity with the provisions of the act of Congress? Congress is given specific authority to make such regulations. No other question is involved but that of the proceedings before the legislature.

It is contended that if it can be shown that ISAAC STEPHENSON attempted by unlawful means to secure the indorsement at the primary election that question may be taken into consideration in determining his right to a seat in this body. I deny that proposition. I claim that it was not necessary and it is not competent to inquire into the regularity of the proceedings at the primary or preceding it. I will, however, concede something to argument. Under the direct primary law of the State of Wisconsin and other States a man may file his petition to go before the primary for its indorsement. ISAAC STEPHENSON filed such a petition. No claim is made that the petition was not in form or did not comply with the statute of the State, but it is charged that in order to secure that indorsement by that straw vote he unlawfully expended large sums of money. He testifies that he expended about $107,000 before the direct primary election for the purpose of securing his indorsement at that direct primary. The testimony shows that that money was expended largely for the purpose of canvassing the electors of the State of Wisconsin and securing their favorable consideration and indorsement at that direct primary. It was expended, according to the testimony, for the purpose of securing the services of men to canvass in the various districts and counties of the State. First, a portion of it was expended for the purpose of securing signers to the nominating petition which he must file.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. I want to ask the Senator a general question, if he will permit me. I preface it by saying that my mind is not made up on this case and I am asking purely for information.

The minority report, as I understand, lays down the general proposition that, it being admitted that the very large gross sum of $107,000 having been expended in this primary, it raises a presumption of impropriety or illegality and shifts the burden from the person who makes the charges to the Senator from Wisconsin himself. In going over this testimony—I have read about 230 or 240 pages of it so far only—I noticed on page 163 an examination by the Senator from Idaho, who is now speaking, of a witness by the name of Sacket, and I will read a question or two and the answers:

The CHAIRMAN. How did you expect to be able to answer a possible charge that you had furnished the money to these men whom you term "organizers," to be used for bribing voters; how did you expect to be able to meet that kind of a charge?

Mr. SACKET. I never expected such a charge to be made.

The CHAIRMAN. You knew the law puts the affirmative upon a man who uses money during a campaign when the use is challenged, did you not?

Mr. SACKET. I did not.

I read this, Mr. President, to ask the Senator at this time if he indorses the position of the minority, that under such circumstances as these the burden is now on the Senator from Wisconsin to show the proper use of this extraordinary amount of money?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Texas had read the next paragraph he would have had the answer to that question. Mr. Sacket said, as has been read by the Senator from Texas:

I did not.

The CHAIRMAN. The law requires the filing of an account which shall state not merely that you paid out money, but shall state the purpose for which you paid it out and that it was applied to that purpose; did you know that?

To which Mr. Sacket replied:

Mr. SACKET. I did not so understand the law.

The CHAIRMAN. You say you read the law?

Mr. SACKET. I did.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a law in the absence of any special statute, is it not? If you pay out money to be used by the party to whom you pay it for purchasing votes or bribing electors, do you not know that you would be responsible under the law of any State in the Union?

Mr. SACKET. I presume I would, if it were proven.

The CHAIRMAN. Then did it not occur to you that this memoranda which you were destroying, even before the primaries and afterwards, made the basis of your defense against such a charge?

That controversy arose over the question asked the witness in regard to keeping and filing accounts. It had no other application; it was stating a question of principle; and I will tell the Senate in a moment what I think in regard to that. The Senator has passed, before coming to that, a controversy that arose between Mr. Littlefield, who was representing Mr. STEPHENSON, and the chairman of the subcommittee in regard to the presumption. If the Senator's attention had been called to that—

Mr. CULBERSON. I simply make the inquiry at this time. I have read it, the report of the committee and the statement of the counsel for Mr. STEPHENSON in the opening proceedings, but I wanted to get the view of the Senator, as he was approaching the discussion of the subject of the expenditure of money, where, in his opinion, the burden of proof lies in this case?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the controversy was as to the general expenditure of money and the keeping and stating of the accounts of such expenditure. I think I have stated it correctly, and I feel at present like adhering to that statement, because I think it is correct. Those expenditures were not all expenditures by Mr. STEPHENSON, but I was seeking simply to fasten the responsibility upon one of his representatives who had charge in part of the disbursement of money as to the rule in keeping accounts of expenditure, and I think the rule is correctly stated.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if it is not a fact that there was a failure to file the proper account under the statute of Wisconsin?

Mr. HEYBURN. That is a question of law, and I will discuss it for a moment. The law of Wisconsin requires all candidates, including their candidates for States offices, to file an account of the expenditures incurred in the contest. The question was whether or not this account, which was admittedly filed within time, and, so far as form is concerned, in compliance with law, was a proper account in so far as it concerned the method of stating the details of expenditure? That was the question under consideration, and I was asking this witness as to whether or not he considered it a proper manner of conducting a campaign, whether a legitimate and authorized campaign or any other to destroy memoranda and state items of expenditure in gross. I was not discussing the question, nor were we considering the question, as to whether or not ISAAC STEPHENSON, under the law, was required to file a statement of account, because he had filed one, but the question was raised for consideration by the committee as to whether or not the account filed was such an account or was such a statement of account as was contemplated by the law. The question would have been just as applicable applied to any other candidate before those primaries.

It was contended that the manner of stating the account was not a compliance with the law. Under the statutes of Wisconsin the failure to file such an account does not affect the title to office, but is made an offense under the law, punishable as prescribed in the law. It is not a question with which the United States Senate should deal, because under no act that governs us in determining this question is any account required.

I was merely testing this witness, who, in the judgment of the subcommittee, as stated in its report, had been very careless and lax in his methods in expending and accounting for moneys in that primary, and, in fact, at every stage of this campaign.

So I think the Senator can not fairly take the matter he has read as applicable beyond the question then at issue, and that was the sufficiency of the account.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield further to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CULBERSON. I did not intend to put any construction upon what the Senator asked the witness, but to ask what construction the Senator himself would now place on it and would place on the law?

Mr. HEYBURN. I will state that. If it were admitted that it was incumbent upon Mr. STEPHENSON to file an account, and the question were raised as to the sufficiency of his act in doing so, then we might probably attach some importance to the quotation from the testimony that has been read by the Senator from Texas and the part following that, which was read by me; but at all times I have maintained, and I maintain now, and I believe every member of the committee then present will agree with me, that it was not incumbent upon Mr. STEPHENSON to show to the senatorial committee investigating this case that he filed any accounts at all, or that if he had filed them that they were a subject of criticism that would go to the merits of the case.

I do not believe that the State of Wisconsin can place any burden upon a Senator that rests upon a statute of general application to candidates for office before a primary or at an election, but we felt that it was proper to bring into the Senate all of the facts pertaining to all of these questions so that they might be submitted to the judgment of the Senate. The committee expressed itself responsibly and officially in its report. The committee in its report takes the position that it was immaterial; but we went into a great many questions that were immaterial, because we realized that the final judgment as to materiality rested with the Senate and not with the committee. Because we bring the record of the proceedings here it is not to be taken as the judgment of the committee that such an account was either required to be filed or that the manner of it was sufficient or insufficient.

Mr. President, it is not competent for the Legislature of Wisconsin or of any State to require a Senator whose title to his seat in this body is questioned to show that he filed an account or that he filed it in a certain manner or that it complied with the State statute, or that it did not, because, under the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, it is not competent for the legislature of a State to regulate the election of a Senator in any particular or to require him to do any act or thing.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield further to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, without reference to the statute of Wisconsin on the subject of reports of expenditures of money in a primary, where does the Senator believe rests the burden in this case when it is shown affirmatively at the beginning that the extraordinarily large sum of $107,000 was paid out in the primary, which at least indirectly led to Mr. STEPHENSON's election to the Senate of the United States by the Legislature of Wisconsin?

Mr. HEYBURN. When charges are made against a Member of this body the burden rests upon the charging party, and never shifts. The presumption is in favor of the regularity and the validity of the proceedings that certify to the Senate that a man has been elected by the legislature of the State.

Mr. CULBERSON. That answers the question that I have been wanting an answer to from the Senator.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am pleased to have arrived at that answer because that is my belief. All the way through this case it has been the contention, and I believe the belief of members of the committee who have inquired into this matter, that there was no burden resting upon Senator STEPHENSON, but that there was a responsibility resting upon him to vindicate himself against any charge of corruption. It would not have been corrupt for him to fail to file an account. The legislature could have elected him had it been confessed before the legislature that no account had been filed or that no attempt had been made to file an account. The legislature might then, proceeding in the performance of its duty under the Constitution, have elected him a Senator regardless of whether an account was filed or an attempt was made to file one.

The real controversy, I will say to the Senator from Texas, arose over the nature of the account, and resulted in a comparison between the account that was filed, which need not have been filed, and the accounts filed by other candidates at the same primary. The attorney who prepared the account testified that when he prepared it he took as a criterion the account filed by the candidate for supreme judge at that same election. It had that approval. It was also in manner similar to the accounts filed by other candidates, regardless of party. It was in conformity with accounts which had been filed at previous elections.

The question in the testimony to which the Senator directed my attention was one intended to probe the conscience of Mr. Sacket. The committee were not satisfied with the manner in which Mr. Sacket and others connected with him in the management of this campaign had conducted it, and, regardless of the legal effect, we deemed it proper to bring the whole proceeding into the Senate for consideration.

Comparatively large sums of money were expended; they were placed in the hands of a banker, and through the banker were distributed to those who were directly in charge of the campaign of Mr. STEPHENSON. It is not necessary that the committee should approve of those methods or disapprove of them in order to determine the question at issue here, which is whether or not Mr. STEPHENSON was elected a Member of this body by corrupt means and methods. The means and methods go to the election, not to the nomination, because, I repeat, there is no such thing known to the law as the nomination of a Senator; and corruption in connection with matters not pertaining to the election of a Senator may be the proper subject for a local jurisdiction to determine, but not for this body. That would involve the question of the judgment of those in charge of the expenditure of this money. They may have erred in judgment; they may not have expended this money in a proper manner; but unless the expenditure was shown to have been corruptly made by the party in interest, then it would not affect the validity of his seat in this body.

Now, let me for a moment consider the character of those expenditures. I am not going into the matter in great detail, but I want to state the principle behind the testimony which we have brought to the Senate. Witness after witness was examined as to the manner of this expenditure. The result was that, to the minds of all the members of the committee who sat at the hearings, there was no corruption shown in connection with the expenditure of this sum of money or of any part of it. It grew out of a vicious law that projects the question of the election of a Senator into a contest where it has no place, but the expenditure of the money was shown to have been under this vicious law, which the candidate seems to have taken upon himself to attempt to comply with.

If he failed to comply with it, he might be responsible to the criminal statutes of the State that made the law, but not to this body, because it was no part of the proceeding of electing a Senator.

Witnesses testified that money was paid to them to organize the counties. I probed those witnesses, and so did other members of the committee, to find out what they meant by "organize." It was an indefinite term, and might mean almost anything, but it transpired that the term "organize" was used to describe the process of getting together a man's friends in each county or subdivision of the State in order that they might work together to secure an indorsement of Mr. STEPHENSON for the election. It was charged that this was an expenditure in violation of the State law, which is a peculiar one, and which I will call attention to in a moment. The money that was paid to organize was paid to men to put up posters, to see men and talk to them in Mr. STEPHENSON's behalf, to distribute literature which told the people how worthy he was and why he should be elected to the Senate. It was made necessary by the fact that there are so large a number of counties and voting precincts in that State that it was reasonable that he should have in each one of them some one who could vouch for him, some one who could tell the voters why they should vote for him, and the money was shown to have been expended—such sums as were expended—for that purpose, with this addition, that on the day of the primary election men were employed with teams to carry voters to the polls, or, at the legal distance from the polls, to hand Mr. STEPHENSON's card to voters to remind them that he was before them for their indorsement.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator there?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have seen it stated that out of 600,000 voters there were at that primary only 190,000 votes cast. Was there any evidence to show why the voting population did not vote—why such a large proportion of the voting population remained at home and did not vote at the primary?

Mr. HEYBURN. It is the usual cause and one of general application. Only a very small proportion of the people anywhere vote at a primary election.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator from Idaho will allow me, I think I can give an answer to the Senator from North Carolina that will conform to the facts as shown in the States that have adopted the primary system, especially in the Northern States. The people are kept so continuously agitated in the matter of elections, one following after another, that they simply get disgusted with the whole thing and will not go to the polls. It is impossible to get them all out.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to his colleague?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. The returns of the last presidential election show that the percentage of voters who remained away from the polls upon election day was almost as large in some of the States as the percentage of those who remained away from the primary. It is not quite fair to put all the remissness of the American voter upon the primary. He is just as likely to go to the primary as he is to go to the election; and, if I had my way, if he stayed away from either I would deprive him of the advantage of going again when he wanted to.

Mr. HEYBURN. I suppose that is probably as strong a statement as can be made in favor of the direct primary, but the fact remains that in the State which my colleague so ably represents in this body I have personal knowledge—and I think he will bear me out—that in some voting precincts the candidates received 8 and 10 votes at the primary and 160 and 180 at the election.

Mr. BORAH. There were about 10 or 15 carriages at the election and none at the primary. That was my observation, and that has been my experience.

My observation has been that if there is no greater exertion made at one time than the other there will be no difference in the vote. It is not because it is a primary or not a primary, but it is simply because interest has not been worked up to a point where the people will take part in the election.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will not at this time pause to enter at length upon the consideration of the primary election law. I may later say something about it.

Mr. OVERMAN. It seems very remarkable to me that in a State with a voting population of six hundred thousand, a hundred and ninety thousand, less than one-third of the voters, should go to the primary. Does the Senator from Idaho know what was the vote at the election following the primary?

Mr. HEYBURN. I have the data. It is in the record.

Mr. OVERMAN. There is no evidence of any attempt to keep voters from going to the polls?

Mr. HEYBURN. No one claims that any money was used for that purpose.

The fact remains that only a small portion of the voters of Wisconsin took advantage of the opportunity to express a preference as to a candidate for United States Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to ask the Senator if, as a matter of fact, there was not really a harder contest made in the primaries, at the time when the workers did not get the people out, than there was at the general election?

Mr. HEYBURN. Perhaps so; and I suspect that the people did not go to the primary to vote on the question of the United States Senatorship for the same reason that I would not go—that it would be a sham battle, binding upon nobody and indicative of nothing that would control anyone.

Mr. McCUMBER. Can not the Senator see another reason, if he will allow me? My observation has been that in the primaries the battle in each party becomes a factional fight in the party, and a personal assault by one faction of the party upon the candidate of the other faction, and there are a great many good partisan men who are willing to go to the polls and vote their party ticket at the election who do not desire to go to the polls at a primary for the purpose of voting against one of their party.

Mr. HEYBURN. Furthermore, my belief is that after an ordinary primary contest, if the people were to take the express judgment of the men of their own party in discussing the merits of the candidates, they would not vote for any of them.

Mr. CULBERSON. Will the Senator allow me to make an inquiry?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will ask the Senator if it is not a fact, as shown by this record, as bearing upon the influence exerted by the primary in this election upon the election itself, that the Republican candidates for the State senate and the State house of representatives did not pledge themselves and bind themselves to vote for Senator for the man nominated in the primaries?

Mr. HEYBURN. I think some of them did.

Mr. CULBERSON. Is not that the general trend of the testimony in the case?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. They had no right to do it; they violated their official duty, if not their official oath, when they did it.

Mr. CULBERSON. One further question. Did not some members of the legislature announce that they would not have voted for the Senator who was elected except for the expression of the primary?

Mr. HEYBURN. No. Some of them gave as a reason for voting, to counteract certain other statements that were made, that Mr. STEPHENSON had received the indorsement of the majority of those who voted at the direct primary.

Mr. CULBERSON. And they voted accordingly.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; but they would have voted the same way had he not received a majority. The Senator will not find in the record any statement or any claim by anyone that he was bound only by that.

Mr. CULBERSON. I stated a while ago that I have read only 230 or 240 pages of the testimony, but I caught from what I did read that the candidates for the legislature, some of whom were furnished money, according to this testimony, during the campaign pledged themselves to vote for the man receiving a majority of the votes in the primary; and some of the members of the legislature announced as they cast their votes, either before or after, that they did so because he had received a majority in the primary.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think perhaps the word "because" might be stricken out. They stated in confirmation of their vote that he had received a majority of the votes at the primary, but they did not, any of them, state that had he not received a majority they would not have voted for him.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to ask the Senator whether he believes that if Mr. STEPHENSON had not received a majority of the Republican votes in the primary those members of the legislature would have voted for him as the Republican candidate?

Mr. HEYBURN. Undoubtedly so. When they were questioned in regard to it they said so.

Mr. BRISTOW. They would have done it anyway?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRISTOW. Whether he had been the Republican nominee at the primary or not?

Mr. HEYBURN. The Republicans would have voted for him.

Mr. BRISTOW. If Mr. Cook or Mr. McGovern had gotten more votes in the primary than Mr. STEPHENSON, then these Republicans would have ignored this indorsement of some other man?

Mr. HEYBURN. If Cook or McGovern had received a majority of the votes in the primary, candidates to the legislature favorable to one or the other of those men would have been elected.

Mr. BRISTOW. Did not the Republican candidates state in the primary that if nominated they would vote for the Republican who received the party nomination in the primaries?

Mr. HEYBURN. Some of them said so. But I do not see how it affects this question one way or another. It is not claimed that any Democrats voted for Mr. STEPHENSON, and if the Republicans chose to abide by the result of the primary that is no violation of any rule or moral law that I know of. The fact was Mr. STEPHENSON was so clearly the choice of the Republicans of the State, as indicated by this straw vote, that there was no excuse for any Republican in the legislature to vote against him.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to his colleague?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Before passing from the subject of the small vote at the primary, it occurred to me, as I was reading the testimony, that there was an utter absence of anything to call out the voter in the campaign other than the use of money; and in saying that I do not use the term in an improper way. But what I mean is this: Apparently there was no discussion of any important question and nothing in the way of a public meeting or public discussion of any matter in which the people of the State might be greatly interested; that is, comparatively no campaign of that kind. The campaign was carried on almost entirely on a cash basis. Those the workers could bring out through organization and through the use of money they seem to have got to the polls, but so far as the record discloses there was pending no question in which the people of the State might themselves have been greatly interested purely as a matter of interest. No political proposition in which the people might have been concerned seems to have played any part in the campaign. That would account to my mind very thoroughly for the absence of those who did not go to the polls.

Mr. HEYBURN. The fact was Senator STEPHENSON was then a member of this body. He had been elected to that position, and the presumption would be that in the absence of any specific objection they would support him for reelection.

Mr. OVERMAN. It has been stated that $850,000 was spent in this primary. Did it take that much money to get out the voters?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not know who said that. I think I saw it in the newspapers.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think I heard Mr. Littlefield make the statement in his argument before the committee.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator is speaking of the sums in the aggregate expended by all the candidates?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. It was a very liberal sort of a campaign, I will admit. I do not approve of it personally. However, I am not here to determine the merits of my belief in that regard, but to determine whether or not Mr. STEPHENSON violated any law which should prevent him from sitting in this body.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. I simply wanted to suggest, in answer to the question put by the Senator from North Carolina, that there was some statement in the brief submitted by Mr. Littlefield to the effect that about $800,000 had been expended not only in the State campaign but in the congressional and county campaign.

Mr. HEYBURN. Altogether?

Mr. POMERENE. Altogether.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. I have not added those sums together. Two or three other candidates expended forty or fifty thousand dollars, or thereabouts, and others twenty-five or thirty thousand dollars, and so on, in the senatorial contest. I do not approve of it. It is not necessary that it should meet with my approval in order to give it its proper place in the consideration and determination of this question. It is a part of this system which I have characterized.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does not that show the viciousness of the primary?

Mr. HEYBURN. I am in entire accord with the Senator from North Carolina; but we are not here to determine the morals of that question.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator from North Carolina seems to be taking this opportunity to strike at the primary system in what seems to me to be a very unfair way.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am speaking of the primary system in Wisconsin.

Mr. BRISTOW. Because men see fit to use large sums of money corruptly or otherwise at primary elections does not necessarily brand all primary elections as of the same character. If the Senator from North Carolina will inquire as to the operations of the primary laws in other States of the Union he will find that the primaries are conducted orderly and without any such expenditure as in this case.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am only discussing the facts as they appear in this primary. Here is a primary in which it is admitted that $850,000 was spent, and out of 600,000 votes in the State only 190,000 were cast. Less than a third of the voting population voted. It took $850,000 to get them to the polls. That is true in the State of Wisconsin, which has been held up as an exemplar of purity and as having such good laws. I am only arguing as to the facts in this State. I do not know what are the facts in Kansas. I should like to know, if the Senator has any evidence on that subject. I do not want to branch off into any other question like that now, but I am bringing forth the facts that occurred in this particular case.

Mr. HEYBURN. I hope the discussion will be confined largely to the facts in this case, because we do not need to go outside of this case to find a basis for a conclusion in regard to this class of performance. It affords an opportunity for a class of citizens to graft upon candidates and to make use of the real or imaginary necessities of the candidate as a means of extorting money from him.

The question here is whether or not this graft was regularly worked out. It was made necessary, so far as the State candidates were concerned, by the laws of the State. The State doubtless—the Supreme Court has said that—had the power to enact this law, but the Supreme Court did not say it had the power to make this law applicable to the candidacy of persons for the United States Senate.

It is charged that the expenditure of this money for the purpose of organizing was in violation of the laws of Wisconsin.

It certainly was not in violation of any law of Congress. It is charged that the practice of sending men out through the State to put up posters, to make arguments, to discuss the merits of men was in violation of the law of Wisconsin. It may be. It is immaterial for the determination of the issue before us.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield.

Mr. BROWN. Does the Senator take the position that a candidate for the Senate can enter on a campaign to get that office in the way provided by a State statute, and then violate that statute, and that we have no right to consider that in determining whether he is entitled to a seat here or not?

Mr. HEYBURN. The State has prescribed the penalty for a violation of that statute, and it does not mention or include the forfeiture of the right to a seat in the United States Senate.

Mr. BROWN. The State statute may not provide for its forfeiture, but does the Senator contend that the Senate has no right to take into consideration the fact, if it be a fact, that a Member of this body has violated the State statute under which he undertook to elect himself here?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not contend any such thing, if the proceeding is one appropriate. That might arise on a question as to the moral character of a Member of this body, but we are not trying that issue.

Mr. BROWN. When the Senator speaks of a proceeding appropriate, he is referring to the State primary of Wisconsin?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BROWN. Now then, does the Senator contend that a candidate for a seat in this Chamber can enter upon that candidacy in accordance with the Wisconsin statute and violate it and we have not the right to inquire into that violation?

Mr. HEYBURN. He did not enter upon it in pursuance of that statute, because the statute is void, and a man can not be bound by a void statute.

Mr. BROWN. But he entered the primaries under the Wisconsin statute for the United States Senate?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; and he might have filed for a corner grocery.

Mr. BROWN. And as provided by that statute he filed a statement of what he had done? Is that true?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BROWN. Now, does the Senator contend that we can not inquire into his violation of the Wisconsin statute when we come to pass on the question whether or not he was legally elected?

Mr. HEYBURN. We have inquired into it, and we have brought here two large volumes of testimony in regard to that question.

Mr. BROWN. Yes; but as I understand, the Senator takes out of our consideration entirely the fact as to whether he lived up to the Wisconsin statute or whether he violated it. I wanted to find out just how far we are to be permitted, under this theory of the Senator, to inquire into his violation of the statute of his own State.

Mr. HEYBURN. Every man, according to his conscience, is permitted to inquire into it the same as he would be permitted to inquire into any other personal act that was not connected with the election of the Senator to the Senate. He might inquire into many questions affecting the integrity of the Senator, but this proceeding was not instituted for that purpose. This proceeding was instituted for the purpose of determining whether or not his election by the legislature was secured by fraud.

Mr. BROWN. Exactly. If money was used at the primary in violation of the law of the Senator's own State, is it the contention of the Senator from Idaho that that has nothing to do with the question whether or not he was legally elected by the legislature?

Mr. HEYBURN. I am not compelled to reach that point, because the testimony has shown and the committee has found that he did not.

Mr. BROWN. Exactly. You have been arguing that this is a vicious statute.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I have not been arguing it. I have asserted it. I have not argued that question.

Mr. BROWN. I have not heard any argument. I heard the Senator's assertion. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not feel under the slightest obligation here to go into an argument on that question. The question at issue is whether Mr. STEPHENSON procured his election, or his nomination, for that matter, by corrupt means.

We bring the testimony here for the consideration of the Senate, and I was discussing the question as to what it is material for us to consider in order to arrive at a conclusion in the matter.

Now, the testimony shows, as I was saying, that the money was expended for purposes of organization. Is that a violation of any law? It is not a violation of the law of Wisconsin, because every man who is a candidate does the same thing, even the candidates for the supreme bench, and until the necessities of this prosecution, if I may so denominate it, seemed to make it useful, if not necessary, no one ever dreamed that the Senator from Wisconsin was open to any such charge.

They made the charges, and then they started out to find something to substantiate them. The man who made the charges, Mr. John J. Blaine, a member of the Senate of Wisconsin, one of the legislative committee of that State which investigated this case, swore in his testimony that he made those charges on information and belief, and that as to the more material matters he knew nothing; that he had no facts. The burden was upon them to sustain those charges, and when we put on the stand the man who made the charges, he said he did not have any information upon which to base them; that he had made them—I will use his language as nearly as I can remember it—for the purpose of giving an investigating committee something to work on.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will it interrupt the Senator if I ask him a question?

Mr. HEYBURN. No.

Mr. OVERMAN. How many counties are there in Wisconsin?

Mr. HEYBURN. There are 71 counties, with 2,200 precincts. Take those 71 counties, and if you appoint three men in a county as head organizers to secure others to do this necessary work of making the voting population familiar with the fact that Mr. STEPHENSON was a candidate and familiar with the facts upon which his candidacy was urged, the expense would amount to a pretty large sum of money. If you expend $20 in each precinct for the purpose of posting his literature and distributing his literature, you have a very large sum of money.

It was charged that it was bribery for Mr. STEPHENSON to contribute to newspapers in order that they might tell their subscribers he was a candidate and why he was a candidate. Mr. Blaine testified that he considered that to be within the bribery statute. No Senator would consider it to be such. They claim that it was bribery for him to employ men to go into the counties for the purpose of organizing. But no Senator will charge that that was bribery. It was the expenditure of money for a purpose made necessary by the direct primary law. Before the abolition of conventions in that and some other States to which representative men were sent by the people for the purpose of selecting candidates for office, where the delegates and the candidates looked each other in the face and measured each other by their action in the convention and upon the recommendation of friends who sent them there and who indorsed them, it was not necessary that a man should be advertised throughout the silent country as a candidate.

I do not desire to tire the Senate after rather a long session, and I will ask that this matter be now laid aside. I renew the notice that I will call it up to-morrow.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, February 29, 1912, at 2 o'clock p. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 28, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Conden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father in heaven, look down from Thy throne of grace with compassion; forgive our sins; be gracious unto us; help us to be true to our better self in all that pertains to life that we may have the good will of our fellow men and inherit Thy praise. So may Thy kingdom come and Thy will be done in all our hearts. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the call rests with the Committee on Military Affairs.

DONATION OF CANNON TO CITY OF JACKSON, MISS.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I call up House bill 9420, authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the city of Jackson, Miss., cannon or fieldpieces.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill. What is the calendar number?

Mr. HAY. Union Calendar, No. 112.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9420) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the city of Jackson, Miss., cannon or fieldpieces.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar, and the House resolves itself automatically into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Moon] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. Moon of Tennessee in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9420) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the city of Jackson, Miss., cannon or fieldpieces.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to donate to the city of Jackson, in the State of Mississippi, two bronze cannon or fieldpieces, with their carriages, not needed for present service, which are now and have been for a number of years mounted on either side of the Confederate monument in one of the parks, called Confederate Veteran Park, in said city of Jackson, in the State of Mississippi.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, this bill proposes to donate to the city of Jackson, Miss., these two cannon that are now placed in this park and which have been in that park for the last 15 years. No expense will be incurred by the United States by reason of the donation of these two fieldpieces. They are of no use to the United States, and the reason for the passage of this bill is that the War Department has directed that these guns be advertised for sale.

I do not know that it is necessary for me to take up the time of the House with any further remarks upon it. There can not be any objection, I think, to the House agreeing to the bill. If nobody desires to ask any questions, I will ask that the committee rise and report the bill.

Mr. MANN. I would like to offer an amendment.

Mr. HAY. All right.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to go a little further than the bill does. I see by the report from the Chief of Ordnance, included in the report on the bill, that there is this statement, contained in a letter addressed to the mayor of Jackson, Miss.:

The 3-inch wrought-iron gun referred to by you is hereby donated to your city. There is no authority of law, however, for the donation of the carriage for this gun, but it can be sold to you at a price of $10.

That is in addition to the two cannon which it is proposed to donate. Would not the gentleman be willing to accept an amendment to include in the donation the carriage for one 3-inch wrought-iron gun?

Mr. HAY. I would be very glad to do it, and I presume the gentleman from Mississippi would be glad.

Mr. COLLIER. If the gentleman from Virginia will permit me, I think the carriage, at least the working part of it, is practically destroyed. These guns were lying out for some years in a park.

Mr. MANN. I understand. But the Secretary of War says there is no authority for him to donate the carriage, but it can be sold to the mayor for the price of $10, which is not a very large amount. Why not do it all at once and not make two bites of the cherry?

Mr. HAY. What is the amendment?

Mr. MANN. The amendment is to insert in line 5, after the word "Mississippi," the words "the carriage for one 3-inch wrought-iron gun and."

Mr. HAY. All right.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert, after the word "Mississippi," in line 5, the following: "the carriage for one 3-inch wrought-iron gun and."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that the amendment be adopted and that the bill as amended do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] moves that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that the amendment be adopted and that the bill as amended do pass. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Moon of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9420) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the city of Jackson, Miss., cannon or fieldpieces, and had directed him to report the same back to the House, with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On line 5, page 1, after the word "Mississippi," insert the words "the carriage for one 3-inch wrought-iron gun and."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title of the bill was amended so as to read: "A bill authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the city of Jackson, Miss., carriage and cannon or fieldpieces"

On motion of Mr. HAY, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE FOR FEMALE NURSE CORPS.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 18781) providing for cumulative leaves of absence for the superintendent and members of the female nurse corps when serving in Alaska or at places without the limits of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the superintendent and members of the female nurse corps, when serving in Alaska or at places without the limits of the United States, may be allowed the same privileges in regard to cumulative leaves of absence and method of computation of same as are now allowed by law to Army officers so serving.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar, and the House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for its consideration. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. SULZER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, this bill is intended to cure a defect in the act of March 23, 1910, in which female nurses were allowed cumulative leave of absence at the rate of 30 days for each calendar year; but the act made no provision as to the commencement or termination of leave when granted to those serving in Alaska or places without the limits of the United States.

The act of July 29, 1876, grants to Army officers leave of absence for 30 days in each year. The leave is cumulative, and may be extended to 4 months if taken only once in 4 years. It is simply desired by this bill to put the superintendent of the female nurse corps and the members of the corps on the same footing as officers in the Army. I think it is a matter of justice to that corps, and that the bill ought to be agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAY. I will.

Mr. MANN. I notice that the bill says they may be—Allowed the same privileges in regard to cumulative leaves of absence—

And so forth.

As I understand it, this does not change and is not intended to change the law at all as to cumulative leaves of absence, except as to the time when the leave commences and ends.

Mr. HAY. That is all. I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SULZER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 18781) providing for cumulative leaves of absence for the superintendent and members of the female nurse corps when serving at Alaska or places without the limits of the United States, and had directed him to report the same back to the House without amendment and with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, there is a similar Senate bill (S. 4749) on the Speaker's table. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate bill be substituted for the House bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that Senate bill 4749, which is identical with the House bill 18781, be substituted for it. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

Mr. MANN. Let us have it read.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The bill says:

Without the limits of the United States.

Is that intended to mean without the limits of continental United States?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. This bill under its terms applies to Hawaii?

Mr. HAY. It is not intended to apply to Hawaii. It only applies to Panama, Porto Rico, and the Philippine Islands.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the Senate bill pass?

The bill was passed.

By unanimous consent, House bill 18781 was ordered to lie on the table.

PAYMENTS FOR SUGGESTIONS MADE BY EMPLOYEES IN THE ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 17937) authorizing the Secretary of War to pay a cash reward for suggestions submitted by employees of certain establishments of the Ordnance Department for improvement or economy in manufacturing processes or plant.

The SPEAKER. This bill being on the Union Calendar, the House will resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. GARNER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 17937, of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17937) authorizing the Secretary of War to pay a cash reward for suggestions submitted by employees of certain establishments of the Ordnance Department for improvement or economy in manufacturing processes or plant.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, during the closing days of the extra session of the present Congress a special committee was appointed, consisting of Hon. WILLIAM B. WILSON of Pennsylvania, Hon. WILLIAM C. REDFIELD of New York, and myself to investigate the so-called Taylor efficiency system of shop management and other systems of shop management, with special reference to their application to Government works. In pursuance of our work we heard much testimony as to relations between Government officials in charge of Government works and the Government employees in such works. One of the questions considered was as to whether there has been heretofore proper cooperation between the management and employees and especially as to whether the Government has received such benefit as it should from suggestions growing out of the skill and experience of its employees. It was suggested by Gen. Crozier, Chief of Ordnance, that the full advantage of such cooperation had not been had by the Government on account of there being no adequate means by which the Government could offer suitable inducements to the workmen. Under the present law no other remuneration could be given to employees making such suggestions than to note such suggestions on their efficiency cards. Such workmen might be already in the highest grade, so that it could be of no advantage to them, except in the improbable event of preventing reduction to the next lower grade.

A number of instances were brought to the attention of the committee where valuable suggestions had been made by workmen and adopted by the management to the advantage of the Government without any corresponding advantage to the workmen making the suggestions. This is not fair to the workmen, and I am very glad to have a part in providing a remedy for the injustice. Following out a suggestion of Gen. Crozier, I introduced this bill, which authorizes the Secretary of War, at his discretion, to pay suitable cash rewards for such suggestions from employees as may be adopted and used. I conferred with a considerable number of workmen, including a number of labor-union leaders, and all agreed that it would be a most desirable thing for both the Government and the workmen if such legislation were enacted. The Committee on Military Affairs has unanimously approved the bill, and it is here now on the recommendation of that committee that it do pass.

In the report are cited a number of instances of valuable suggestions being made by employees. Gen. Crozier, as well as Col. Burr, commandant of the Rock Island Arsenal, stated before the investigating committee that a large number of such instances could be cited. It is well known that in many private establishments this policy has long been in vogue and that many useful improvements have come as the result of such cooperation. There is no reason why our Government arsenals should not follow the same course. In fact, there is every reason why they should, and this bill authorizes them to do so.

It will be noted that no appropriation is called for in the bill and that any amount paid out for rewards for valuable suggestions must come out of an appropriation already made for general and shop expenses. The total amount which may be expended in all the Government arsenals in any one month is limited to $1,000, so that the aggregate amount that could be paid out under this bill is $12,000 per year. I believe that the expenditure of this small amount of money in this way will yield large results, both to the Government, in the way of economies, and also to the employee whose brain and intelligent skill are thus rewarded. There is a further advantage—and, to my mind, the greatest of all—growing out of this legislation. It will tend toward bringing the management and the employees into closer and more friendly relations with each other. It will be a forward move on the part of these Government establishments, bringing them into line with our most advanced private concerns. Our Government has not always maintained its manufacturing plants as models in their respective lines. It is gratifying to note a general disposition toward improvement. The arsenals and armories under the Ordnance Department have made most commendable progress in the direction of better conditions for workmen and a higher degree of efficiency in production. A closer and more harmonious relation between management and employees is now being sought in the proper spirit by both. This legislation will aid in bringing it to pass. I have found Government employees willing and eager to do their full share in establishing and maintaining relations of helpful cooperation. I know from conferences with a number of them and from letters from others that this bill will be received by them as an evidence that fair dealing for all is intended.

Now I shall be very glad to answer, so far as I am able, any questions that may be asked in regard to this measure.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. In reference to some of the details of the bill, I understand that the scope of the bill is confined to the Ordnance Department of the War Department.

Mr. TILSON. That is the intention.

Mr. MANN. As I understand, the purpose of the bill contemplates a possible expenditure of $12,000 a year?

Mr. TILSON. That is correct; including all the Government arsenals and armories.

Mr. MANN. I see that the bill states that the total amount paid under the provisions of this act shall not exceed $1,000 in any one month. I take it that it might take the Chief of Ordnance or the Secretary of War in some cases a longer time than it would in others to determine whether the reward ought to be paid at all. Would it not be desirable to provide that the amount paid shall not exceed $1,000 for any one month?

Mr. TILSON. I believe that would better express the idea and carry out the exact meaning that was intended to be put into the bill.

Mr. MANN. The bill provides that the rewards shall be paid for a suggestion which shall be deemed the most valuable of those submitted and adopted for use. It might be that some suggestion would be adopted, and yet not be considered worthy of receiving a reward. Would the gentleman object to inserting an amendment, which would come in after the word "cost," on page 2, line 3, reading as follows: "And, in the opinion of the Secretary, shall be so worthy as to entitle the employee making the same to receive the reward?"

Mr. TILSON. That was undoubtedly the original intention, and I shall be very glad to accept it, as it would make it more clear.

Mr. NYE and Mr. FITZGERALD rose.

Mr. NYE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. NYE. Is this a unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. TILSON. It is a unanimous report.

Mr. NYE. Does this include the full scope of the inquiry of the committee on the Taylor system?

Mr. TILSON. Not at all; this is only an incident of it. This does not come from that committee. The data that led to the introduction of this bill was brought out before that committee. Now I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the amount stated in the bill that may be paid is $1,000 a month. The report states that the payments are to be made from general appropriations for shop expenses. Does the gentleman believe that the department has an appropriation that will enable this sum to be paid out of its current appropriations?

Mr. TILSON. It says so in the bill, "and shall constitute part of the general or shop expense of the establishment."

Mr. FITZGERALD. I know; but it does not say so in the bill; the gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. TILSON. It says it shall constitute part of the general or shop expense of the establishment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand that; but my recollection does not make me believe that appropriations for the arsenals are so lavish that the department has any surplus funds from which to pay these rewards.

Mr. TILSON. I made inquiry of the Chief of Ordnance in regard to that, and he felt sure that he would be authorized, under the appropriation bill as it stands, to pay these rewards from the general or shop expense fund.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand the gentleman in his report to say that is the fund from which it is to be paid, but I do not know that the appropriations for arsenals are so generous that there would be money to meet any such payments if demand were made upon them. Has the gentleman any information as to the amount of appropriations that would be available to meet these items?

Mr. TILSON. No; I have no definite information as to that. We relied upon the Chief of Ordnance, Gen. Crozier, who felt confident that he would be authorized, under the appropriation as it stands, to make these payments from the "general or shop expenses," and those were the words he used, and I assumed that he had the funds under that head which he could use for that purpose.

Mr. MANN. I would suggest to the gentleman from New York—

Mr. HAY. In the Army bill there is an item carried for ordnance service which amounts to about $200,000.

Mr. MANN. Three hundred thousand dollars—that is, there is an item in the Army appropriation bill which the House passed under the head of the Ordnance Department, ordnance service, which includes, among other things, in the item:

For incidental expenses of the ordnance service and those attending practical trials and tests of ordnance, small arms, and other ordnance stores; and for publications for libraries of the Ordnance Department, including the Ordnance Office, and payment for mechanical labor in the office of the Chief of Ordnance, $300,000.

Whether that would cover it or not, I do not know.

Mr. HAY. I think that is the appropriation out of which expenses now have been made, but I do not believe it will amount to as much as $1,000 a month.

Mr. TILSON. It is not anticipated they will, but that would be the limit.

Mr. HAY. It was thought well to provide some limit, and I do not think it would ever go that much unless some very extraordinary occasion arose.

Mr. TILSON. If there is no further debate, I ask for the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to offer periodically at such of the establishments of the Ordnance Department as he may select a cash reward for the suggestion, or series of suggestions, for an improvement or economy in manufacturing processes or plant, submitted within the period by one or more employees of the establishment which shall be deemed the most valuable of those submitted and adopted for use: Provided, That to obtain this reward the winning suggestion must be one that will clearly effect a material economy in production or increase efficiency or enhance the quality of the product in comparison with its cost: Provided further, That the sums awarded to employees in accordance with this act shall be paid them in addition to their usual compensation and shall constitute part of the general or shop expense of the establishment: Provided further, That the total amount paid under the provisions of this section shall not exceed $1,000 in any month: And provided further, That no employee shall be paid a reward under this act until he has properly executed an agreement to the effect that the use by the United States of the suggestion, or series of suggestions, made by him shall not form the basis of a further claim of any nature upon the United States by him, his heirs, or assigns.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, on page 2, line 9, I move that the word "in" be stricken out and the word "for" inserted therefor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 9, strike out the word "in" and insert in lieu thereof the word "for."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that after the word "in" and before the word "month," in line 9, page 2, the word "one" be inserted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 9, after the word "in," insert the word "one."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, in line 9, page 2, strike out the first word, "section," and insert in lieu thereof the word "act."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 9, strike out the word "section" and insert in lieu thereof the word "act."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I move the following amendment, in line with the suggestion made by the gentleman from Illinois, insert after the word "cost," in line 3, page 2, the following: "And in the opinion of the Secretary shall be so worthy as to entitle the employee making the same to receive the reward."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 3, page 2, after the word "cost," insert the following: "And in the opinion of the Secretary shall be so worthy as to entitle the employee making the same to receive the reward."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TILSON. In line 1, page 2, there is one word misspelled. I suggest the correction of the spelling in the word "suggestion."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 1, insert another "g" in the word "suggestion."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 17937) authorizing the Secretary of War to pay a cash reward for suggestions submitted by employees of certain establishments of the Ordnance Department for improvement or economy in manufacturing processes or plant, and had directed him to report the same to the House with certain amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? [After a pause.] The vote will be taken en bloc.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. GILLET. Mr. Speaker, I am heartily in favor of this bill, and I am glad that there has come this result from the hearings before the committee to investigate the methods of work at the Government armories. I think it is a very natural result. No committee or man could become familiar with the work in these establishments without being impressed with the fact that the ingenuity of the employees is constantly improving methods whereby the Government saves money, and I am glad to support this first step toward recognizing and encouraging that ingenuity and enterprise. In the city of Springfield, which I represent, for over a hundred years there have been employed in the United States armory some of the most skillful mechanics in the world, and if they had been compensated for all the processes and improvements and inventions which their brains and hands have contributed to the manufacture of small arms there would be many more families of affluence in Springfield to-day. But they were interested in their work; they devoted their Yankee shrewdness to the service of the Government without any reward except their day's pay, and the whole country has profited from it. Now, when machinery is so highly developed and processes of manufacture have become so scientific and perfect there is not the same opportunity for improvements that there has been in the past; but even now at Springfield suggestions are still made which lead to economy and time saving, and it is wise for the Government to recognize and reward such devotion. It will be an encouragement to the men, and while I believe that without this incitement they would continue to give to the Government their zealous help and suggestions in the future as they have in the past, still to have the United States give some evidence that it appreciates such service is but fair and will, I think, have excellent results and be to the ultimate advantage of both the Government and its employees.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, this bill, which comes with a unanimous report from the Committee on Military Affairs, is as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17937) authorizing the Secretary of War to pay a cash reward for suggestions submitted by employees of certain establishments of the Ordnance Department for improvement or economy in manufacturing processes or plant.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to offer periodically at such of the establishments of the Ordnance Department as he may select a cash reward for the suggestion, or series of suggestions, for an improvement or economy in manufacturing processes or plant, submitted within the period by one or more employees of the establishment which shall be deemed the most valuable of those submitted and adopted for use: Provided, That to obtain this reward the winning suggestion must be one that will clearly effect a material economy in production or increase efficiency or enhance the quality of the product in comparison with its cost: Provided further, That the sums awarded to employees in accordance with this act shall be paid them in addition to their usual compensation and shall constitute part of the general or shop expense of the establishment: Provided further, That the total amount paid under the provisions of this section shall not exceed $1,000 in any month: And provided further, That no employee shall be paid a reward under this act until he has properly executed an agreement to the effect that the use by the United States of the suggestion, or series of suggestions, made by him shall not form the basis of a further claim of any nature upon the United States by him, his heirs, or assigns.

I consider this bill of unusual merit. It provides authority for the proper reward of men working in the arsenals of the United States who make valuable suggestions looking toward improvements and economy in manufacturing processes.

Under the law at present there is no inducement offered for men to contribute ideas of this character.

The Government arsenals have in their employ men of the highest character and skill. They are men who are contributing valuable services to the Government. And I know that even without any reward whatever they have made many valuable suggestions which have been accepted by the Government. The Chief of Ordnance, on January 22, 1912, in a communication to the committee, cites the following specific cases where men in the employ of the Government at its arsenals have made such suggestions and the same have been accepted and adopted by the Government:

[Memorandum giving some typical cases of suggestions made by employees of the Ordnance Department for which it has not been possible to pay any reward under existing law. For similar cases a reward could be paid if H. R. 17937, Sixty-second Congress, second session, should become law.]

Suggested change from a chip reamer to a fluted reamer for reaming the bore of small arms. This improvement effected a saving of between 20 and 25 cents per barrel, which for the barrels made since the adoption of the suggestion amounts to at least $200,000.

Suggested automatic cartridge-trimming device. The estimated saving resulting from the adoption of this device is $9,500 per annum.

Suggested automatic varnishing device for caliber .30 ammunition. Estimated saving, $10,000 per annum.

Suggestion for improved cupping die for cartridge cases. Estimated saving, $750 per annum.

Suggestion for varnish-drying device for cartridge cases. Estimated saving, $2,000 per annum.

Suggested improvement in canteen cover. Estimated saving, $200 per annum.

Suggested improvement in substituting low steel for tool steel in the shanks of large drills. Estimated saving per annum, $260.

Suggested improvement in method of machining fuse-hole bushings for projectiles. Estimated saving on one order for 11,000 bushings, $500.

Suggestion for high-pressure testing device for shrapnel cases. Estimated saving, $2,500 per annum.

Suggestion for an adjustable arbor for milling machines. Estimated saving, $300 per annum.

Suggested improvement on bullet-assembling machine. Estimated saving, $600 per annum.

Suggested improvement on slug-forming machine. Estimated saving, $500 per annum.

Suggested improvement for glueing machine. Estimated saving, $375 per annum.

Suggested lubricating device for bullets. Estimated saving during five years of use, $10,000.

ORDNANCE OFFICE, January 22, 1912.

The men who made the foregoing suggestions did not receive one cent in the way of reward. They could not and did not receive any benefit for their valuable ideas, except, perhaps, a slight credit on their efficiency card. It strikes me as absolutely right and proper that men who thus render service of value to the Government should receive a substantial reward. I believe the effect of the passage of this bill will result in a great benefit to both the men and the Government.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the amended bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TILSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

—MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3776) permitting the board of county commissioners of Lincoln County, State of Montana, to construct, maintain, and operate three bridges across the Kootenai River in the State of Montana.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. J. Res. 232. Joint resolution extending the operation of the act for the control and regulation of the waters of Niagara River, for the preservation of Niagara Falls, and for other purposes.

BRIGADE POST AT FORT OGLETHORPE, GA.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 17029, authorizing the Secretary of War to convert the regimental Army post at Fort Oglethorpe into a brigade post.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17029) authorizing the Secretary of War to convert the regimental Army post at Fort Oglethorpe, Ga., into a brigade post.

The SPEAKER. This bill being on the Union Calendar, the House resolves itself automatically into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the same, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CURLEY] will take the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to convert the regimental Army post at Fort Oglethorpe, Ga., into a brigade post, and that for the purpose of the enlargement of the same to accommodate and quarter a brigade of troops there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $700,000, or so much as may be necessary for this purpose.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War, in his discretion, may locate and construct buildings necessary for the use and accommodation of the troops of the brigade at any point in the Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Military Park, whether the same be contiguous to Fort Oglethorpe or not, said buildings to be used for the accommodation of part of the brigade to be located at Fort Oglethorpe.

Also the following committee amendment:

Strike out, after the word "post," on page 1, line 5, all the words down to and including the word "purpose," in line 10, on the same page.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, this bill was very strongly recommended by the Secretary of War as being a part of the concentration scheme which he is now trying to enforce. The committee, after careful consideration, have recommended the bill favorably, amending it, however, by striking out that part of the bill providing for an appropriation of $700,000. The committee thought that the War Department could, out of the current annual appropriation for barracks and quarters, and for roads and sewers, build up this post without incurring any additional expense. I will read what the Secretary of War says, in order to apprise the committee of the fact that it is a part of the project for concentration of the troops:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 5, 1912.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
House of Representatives.

Sir: Referring to the bill presented by Representative MOON January 5, 1912, and the bill of same wording presented by Representative LEE January 8, 1912, for the purpose of converting the post at Fort Oglethorpe into a brigade post, I have the honor to report that this department recommends favorable consideration of this measure.

The large extent of land of the Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Military Park made available by the terms of the bill; the climatic conditions, which permit troop training almost the entire year, the strategic advantage of that point, the economic considerations involved by thus concentrating troops, all make the enactment of said project highly advantageous to the Government. Fort Oglethorpe is the site decided upon by the department as the most suitable and available location in the southeastern section of the United States for a brigade of Cavalry.

Very respectfully,

H. L. STIMSON,
Secretary of War.

Does anybody desire time?

Mr. MANN. There are two or three gentlemen who wished to be heard on this bill, but they do not seem to be in the Chamber. Let me say that the gentleman's committee recently reported a bill which was passed by the House for an investigation and report concerning maneuver ground at Anniston, Ala. The gentleman's committee has also reported a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to accept title to about 5,000 acres of land at Tullahoma, in the State of Tennessee, for maneuver ground. If this brigade camp should be established at—

Mr. HAY. The gentleman means a brigade post.

Mr. MANN. A brigade post. Not being a military man, I did not use the correct expression. I call it a camp, because everybody knows what that means. If this brigade camp be established at Fort Oglethorpe, and in connection with the barracks that the Government owns there, why could not that be used for maneuver ground instead of acquiring other ground close to it?

Mr. HAY. That is a matter, of course, in the discretion of the department.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; that is a matter that seems to be put with the gentleman's resolution already passed, and another resolution which is pending.

Mr. HAY. But it comes back to Congress for determination as to whether or not they will accept this site, as I understand it, and the department is not compelled to use either the site at Tullahoma or the site at Anniston.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I take it that when Congress passes a law providing authority to do a certain thing, and acquiring the ground for the purpose, it does not leave to the department very much discretion in regard to it.

Mr. HAY. I call the gentleman's attention to this fact, that Oglethorpe is already a regimental post located in a park owned by the Government. The purpose of the bill is to make it a brigade post. Now, as a matter of fact, the Secretary of War could do that himself if he desired to do so, but he desires that Congress shall pass upon all these questions hereafter coming up with regard to making regimental posts into brigade posts.

Mr. MANN. But the Secretary of War could not, as I understand, without the authority of Congress, locate or construct buildings for the accommodation of the troops of a brigade in the Chickamauga and Chattanooga Military Park?

Mr. HAY. Yes; he could. Why not?

Mr. MANN. What authority has he?

Mr. HAY. The authority he has to expend the appropriation for barracks and quarters at any mobile army post in the United States.

Mr. MANN. Fort Oglethorpe is a post?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is the Chattanooga Military Park, the ground not contiguous to Fort Oglethorpe, a military post?

Mr. HAY. As I understand it, the post is located in the boundaries of this park.

Mr. MANN. There the gentleman thinks he can locate these buildings?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not claim that the Secretary of War would have authority to erect post buildings on some other portion of the park not contiguous to the post. That is the reason why it is in the bill.

Mr. HAY. As to that particular provision, perhaps he would not; but he would have authority to put up buildings at the post on land which has been occupied and used for the troops.

Mr. MANN. What I was trying to get at was this: Here we have had a proposition which has been passed upon, and another proposition which is now up, and still another proposition which is reported. If this post is to be enlarged and these military parks are to be used in the way indicated, why are they not sufficient to be used for maneuver grounds? Why should we accept additional grounds and improve them for national militia maneuvers?

Mr. HAY. The Chickamauga Park may be large enough for maneuver grounds. I think it is. But I do not see that it has anything to do with the other proposition. They are entirely separate and distinct propositions.

Now, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Moon].

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, before the chairman of the committee sits down I would like to ask him a question. Is it not a fact that President Taft, when Secretary of War, recommended this same change of enlarging this into a brigade post?

Mr. HAY. I think so. Now I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Moon].

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, it seems to be the policy of the Government to concentrate the troops of the United States in certain strategic centers. The War Department has made arrangements to that effect, so far as it has been able to do so, and in the opinion expressed by that department it is held that for the purpose of carrying out this concentration of troops in the interest of economy and efficiency in the Army certain places in the United States be made and designated as centers of concentration. The first one mentioned is Fort Oglethorpe, near Chattanooga, Tenn., which is said to be a desirable center, especially for a Cavalry brigade, and then come Fort Sam Houston and Fort McPherson and the Presidio and Columbus Barracks and at Albany. That is the policy of the Government now, which I assume we will all deem to be wise.

As to why a Cavalry post should be placed in the Southeastern States, there is nothing I could say on the subject that would be half so forceful as the report of the Secretary of War on this identical bill. He says, on approving the purpose of this bill:

The large extent of land of the Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Military Park made available by the terms of the bill, the climatic conditions, which permit troop training almost the entire year, the strategic advantage of that point, the economic considerations involved by thus concentrating troops, all make the enactment of said project highly advantageous to the Government. Fort Oglethorpe is the site decided upon by the department as the most suitable and available location in the southeastern section of the United States for a brigade of Cavalry.

Very respectfully,

H. L. STIMSON, Secretary of War.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. How much expenditure for the construction of buildings is anticipated, if this bill should pass?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I placed in the text of this bill originally the sum of $700,000, purely as an arbitrary figure. It may take $500,000 ultimately to construct the barracks that are needed there, but that is stricken from the bill, because of the fact that it is left to the discretion of the Secretary of War alone to determine the advisability and feasibility of the project, and he has enough money in the general appropriation to carry it out if desired.

I want to say in reference to these matters that these Army posts are built up largely in this way. There is already a post at Fort Oglethorpe that cost, I believe, $1,114,000. It is full too large for the regiment that is there. It will accommodate part of another regiment. In pursuance of the policy referred to it is desired that a brigade be placed there for the reasons stated by the Secretary of War. The ground is owned by the United States. There is a park of between 6,000 and 7,000 acres of land that belongs to the Government. There is a rifle range of a thousand acres near it. Fort Oglethorpe is situated within this park. It may be desirable to put the barracks for the other regiments close to the fort as it now exists. It may be best to place them a few hundred yards, or a thousand yards, or half a mile away, and we want to leave this discretion as to the location to the Secretary of War. At Fort Oglethorpe we now have the water plant and the electric-light plant. In that great park monuments have been placed by different States of the Union commemorating the valor of the soldiers of the States who fought upon the field of Chickamauga. It will be remembered that this park is on the Chickamauga battle field itself.

The advantages of this location are many; not only its strategic position, but the ease of access to it. There are eight great trunk lines that run within 10 miles of the park, convenient for the movement of troops in any direction throughout the United States. There is one railroad that runs right through the edge of the park. There is an electric line that runs to the park from the city of Chattanooga, some 8 or 10 miles distant. At Chattanooga and in the surrounding country supplies for the soldiers, for the Cavalry horses, and for all that may be needed at the park can be bought perhaps as cheaply as anywhere else in the United States. These are some of the advantages of that location.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. If I understand the gentleman, there is already provision for one regiment at that fort?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The fort was constructed for one regiment, but it is ample to contain a portion of another regiment.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Has it accommodations for Cavalry?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. It is a Cavalry regiment that is there now.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. This bill, if passed, would authorize provision for two additional Cavalry regiments, would it not?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. For one brigade, which would be three regiments, as I understand it, including the one that is already there.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. The gentleman has stated, I think, that the cost for the present barracks and buildings has been something like $1,200,000.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. $1,114,000, but that means the ground. There are 6,000 acres of ground there owned by the United States.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Does the $1,400,000 include the purchase of the ground?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes; I think so.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. What has been the expense in the construction of the barracks and the buildings?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I do not know.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Has the gentleman had any estimate made?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I should think it would take between $500,000 and $700,000 ultimately to construct the barracks that will be desired in the concentration of these troops.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I think the expenditure generally for the construction of the buildings and fixing the grounds for regimental posts has been over $1,000,000 for each regimental provision.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I do not include in that estimate the 1,000 acres of land that Congress bought two years ago, for which it paid $20,000.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Is the gentleman quite sure that $1,400,000 includes the purchase of the ground?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I would not be certain of it; but I think it does, because of the fact that at the time the ground was purchased land was very cheap.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. This is a part of the national park?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. It is in the national park.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. What is the acreage of the park?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Between 6,000 and 7,000 acres.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Then does the gentleman mean for us to understand that the expenditure for this 6,000 or 7,000 acres of land is included in the $1,400,000?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I think so; for at the time that was acquired that land was not worth more than $10 to $15 an acre. The gentleman must recollect that this park is 10 miles from any town or city, is back in the ridges and valleys, and in a country that is not particularly fertile.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Is the Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Military Park wholly within the control of the War Department, or is there a commission?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. It is wholly within the control of the War Department, because the commission is under the control of the War Department, and the War Department supervises and controls the action of the commission. The commission acts until some question arises for decision, and that is decided by the War Department.

Mr. MANN. Do we not appoint the commission?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The House of Representatives? The President appoints the commission. The law provides that the Secretary of War shall make the appointment, but, as a matter of fact, we know that the President is always consulted on this subject.

Mr. Chairman, in view of the forceful position that is taken by the Secretary of War and all the facts as they exist and the necessity for the enlargement of this post under the economic system of the department, I feel that there ought not to be any objection to the passage of this bill.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I would like to ask the gentleman one question more. Does he consider it good legislation to authorize the provision for two additional regiments at that place without any limitation upon the amount that the Secretary of War may expend?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. It could not be built except out of the general appropriation already made for military purposes, and that is purely within the discretion of the Secretary of War. He need not build it at all. The whole matter is within his discretion. I will say to the gentleman, however, that in most posts in the United States there never have been any appropriations for their construction.

[The time of Mr. MOON of Tennessee having expired, Mr. HAY yielded him five minutes more.]

Nearly every post in the United States in the beginning was constructed without specific appropriations from this House. It was under the influence of the first commissioner, that great and good old man Gen. Boynton, that this work was done in commemoration of that great battle.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Under the present law the Secretary of War could not expend over $20,000 on any one structure except under special authorization.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The gentleman does not interpret the law on the subject as I do. This question is not a new one. Outside the proposition of concentration offered by the Secretary of War, the present President of the United States when Secretary of War felt it to be his duty to go before the Military Affairs Committee and recommend the enlargement of this post, and he was so deeply interested in the question that he brought with him the General of the Army, and they recommended the enlargement of this post and the maneuvering grounds. The General of the Army insisted on legislation along this line in the interest of the National Government. It is a proposition that has been supported all along outside of the new idea of concentration, and the President even in his campaign thought so much of it that he promised the people that he would take an interest in the establishment of this maneuvering ground and post if he was elected President of the United States.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question. How far is Chickamauga Park from Fort Oglethorpe?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Fort Oglethorpe is in Chickamauga Park.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN].

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I hope there will be no opposition to this bill on this side of the Chamber. It is not only a meritorious proposition, but it is one coming here with the indorsement of two Republican Secretaries of War, the present able Secretary and President Taft. It comes here with a unanimous report from the Committee on Military Affairs. It was passed upon by a commission from the War Department, it has the approval of practically every leading general, it is in the interest of the Army, it is in the interest of the service, and it is in the interest of the country. This is a proposition long advocated by my able and efficient colleague from the third district of Tennessee [Mr. MOON], and I have never known him since I have been a Member of this House to father any legislation which I did not believe honestly was in the interest of the public service, and I hope that my colleagues on this side will give their united support to this bill. Chattanooga is a great historical place, and the immortal battle field of Chickamauga, where the world witnessed the great valor and peerless courage of the men of the North and the South, should be a lasting monument to the American people and the American soldiery. I sincerely trust that this bill will encounter no opposition in this House. [Applause.]

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe this bill should be passed. It is here apparently in response to a recommendation that Fort Oglethorpe be made a brigade post. It is apparently to carry out a policy of the War Department not yet accepted by the Congress and not yet put into effect. The Secretary of War, under date of January 25, 1912, recommended that certain Army posts be abandoned and that provision be made for the enlargement and concentration of troops at certain other posts. In the Army appropriation bill, by amendments placed thereon in the House, provision is made that no appropriation shall be expended for improvements at certain posts indicated by the Secretary of War as proper for abandonment, but that policy has not yet been adopted by the Congress, nor has any comprehensive, definite, fixed policy been adopted as to where troops shall be concentrated and as to what shall be done for their protection.

No limitation is placed upon the amount that may eventually be expended upon this post; no estimate of its cost of what the post will need has been made. There is some indication as to how much the initial expenditure might be by the fact that this bill as introduced provided that there should be expended, to carry out the provisions of the bill, $700,000 during the next fiscal year. Mr. Chairman, before Congress initiates a policy of largely increasing the size and capacity of these posts the Congress itself should adopt a definite, permanent policy in regard to what shall be done. That the War Department is not to be relied upon I shall demonstrate in a few moments. It has no fixed policy; it has no permanent policy. It changes its policy overnight. No one here will say or can authoritatively say that within six months or a year the War Department will not be back in Congress advocating the retention and maintenance of small posts rather than large posts. I have in my hand some papers of a very interesting character which show the fluctuating, unstable, unreliable policy of the War Department, and the futility of Congress attempting to rely upon its recommendations, and the necessity for Congress itself adopting a permanent policy before it begins piecemeal to go into the matter of authorizing the enlargement of posts. In the sundry civil act, approved March 4, 1909, and also in the act approved June 25, 1910, $200,000 was appropriated, and contracts were authorized not to exceed $600,000 for the establishment of a Cavalry post for what is known as Camp Schofield in the Hawaiian Islands. The authorization was made in response to a unanimous demand upon the Committee on Appropriations by the General Staff as to the imperative necessity for Cavalry accommodations in the Hawaiian Islands. The appropriation was made because it was believed to be imperatively needed for the public defense, and it was made available speedily because of the pressing necessity for the accommodations. Under date of May 3, 1911, the Secretary of War forwarded a communication to me requesting that the money appropriated for the establishment of Cavalry barracks on the Island of Oahu be modified so as to permit the purchase of additional land in the city of Honolulu and the erection of barracks thereon to accommodate three regiments of Infantry. The statement was made that the Cavalry was so much more needed at that time on our Mexican border and could be so much more economically maintained in the United States than in the Hawaiian Islands that it was not deemed desirable to send Cavalry at that time to Honolulu, but that it was desired that the money be made available for Infantry barracks.

The Senate, on the 16th day of May last, passed an act in compliance with this request of the War Department to make available the money for Infantry barracks rather than Cavalry barracks. As the result of a notification sent by me to the War Department, its policy again was changed. Under date of February, 1912, an estimate was submitted to Congress in connection with the matter. The communication which I sent to the Secretary of War, under date of May 4, is as follows:

COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., May 4, 1911.

Hon. JACOB MCG. DICKINSON,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your favor of the 3d instant, with inclosures, relative to legislation to permit the use of appropriations heretofore made for the accommodation of Cavalry in Hawaii, for the accommodation of Infantry in the city of Honolulu, is at hand.

It is the policy of the House and of this committee not to enter upon the consideration of general legislative matters during this session. Unless there be some matter of imperative necessity, consideration will be deferred until the next regular session of Congress.

The suggestions contained in your letter indicate a very marked change from the grounds heretofore taken as to the necessity of Cavalry accommodations on the island of Oahu, and would probably necessitate careful and exhaustive investigation by the committee before any action would be taken.

Very truly, yours,

JOHN J. FITZGERALD.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I did not catch just what the gentleman was reading. What is he discussing now?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am discussing the fluctuating attitude of the War Department.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The fact that the War Department changed in its attitude about some things? Are you discussing the Hawaiian position?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am showing just what the Department of War has done within the past few months.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I just wanted to get in line with the argument.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I was discussing what the department stated to be imperatively necessary for the public defense in the Hawaiian Islands and its changing attitude.

Under date of February 19, 1912, after this request of last May, and after the Senate had passed, in compliance with the War Department's request, a bill to make this money appropriated for Cavalry available for Infantry barracks, an estimate was transmitted to Congress requesting that the authorization contained in the sundry civil acts, to which I have referred, providing accommodations for two squadrons of Cavalry on the island of Oahu, be amended and changed so as to permit the construction of accommodations for a full regiment of Cavalry on that island. In his communication the Secretary calls attention to the fact that the Quartermaster General states that in view of existing conditions in Hawaii the interests of the service demand that the post located at the Schofield Barracks Reservation be completed "as expeditiously as possible." Though the department had had the appropriation for more than two years, no step was taken to use it to build this Cavalry post, so urgently required, until it was found that Congress would not follow the department in its fluctuating and unstable policy.

It is now proposed, upon this letter of the Secretary of War, without any authoritative determination by Congress as to its policy, to authorize the construction or the conversion of this regimental post into a brigade post. I shall read an extract from this communication of the Secretary which may condemn in the language of the department itself this very project more forcibly than I can do it myself.

Speaking of the old system under which posts had grown up the Secretary of War said:

The Army leaders had grown old under a system of scattered posts due to former Indian troubles. The board of general officers recommended 52 of the 65 Army posts for permanent occupation, 13 for temporary occupation, and the establishment of 7 new posts. Army Regulations stated nothing as to the importance of combined maneuvers, but dwelt strongly on the post commander's duty to make his post "an attractive home for the Army by every means available." For years a beautiful parklike reservation had been the surest means of gaining for the commanding officer favorable mention at the annual inspection. There had been no General Staff to consider the needs of the Army as a whole, no Chief of Staff to coordinate the idea of progressive subordinates and recommend the proper course of action. As a whole, the Army was not aware of its own shortcomings.

Yet here is a recommendation from the War Department that Fort Oglethorpe, now a regimental post, be enlarged into a brigade post, and that the department be permitted to locate such of the buildings as it desires within the Chickamauga National Park, so as very likely to give that parklike appearance which would commend its commanding officer to the good graces of his superiors in the War Department. One of the arguments in favor of the concentration of troops is that buildings could be placed close together so that there would be economies effected in administration and in the maintenance of the post.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly. I yield.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman think it would be wise to give this discretion, and that it is best not to crowd all these buildings up together, but to locate some of them a little distance from the others? Ought not that discretion be left to the Secretary of War?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think in a post sufficient to accommodate a brigade of troops all of the buildings can not be very closely located to one another, but this bill provides—and I call the gentleman's attention to the provisions of it—that these buildings may be located in any portion of this park, regardless of whether the place where located is contiguous to Fort Oglethorpe. It is impossible to have that concentration and that desirable economy of maintenance and administration by scattering these buildings through any part of this 7,000-acre national park.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The gentleman has stated that it ought to be, in wisdom, left to the discretion of the Secretary of War.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Perhaps I do not go as far as the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. But you can not determine in advance that the Secretary of War is going to do a thing so ill-advised as what you suggest.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know. I have just read from the official records as to what the War Department has done, as to what the Secretary of War has done, recommending last May that an appropriation made two years ago for Cavalry quarters in the Hawaiian Islands be diverted to Infantry quarters, and urging in February that authority be given to provide larger accommodations for Cavalry, and calling attention to the fact that expedition is necessary in the construction of the quarters because of the conditions pointed out three years previously to the Committee on Appropriations.

Before any attempt is made to concentrate troops, before any attempt is made to enlarge any of the existing posts, I believe that Congress should, by legislation, lay down a definite policy and state positively what posts shall be maintained, either as regimental or brigade posts, and what posts shall be definitely abandoned, and then proceed in a proper and logical manner to make the expenditures therefor. Not only that, but the War Department should be compelled to submit detailed estimates showing what it would cost to make the necessary enlargement, showing what buildings are needed, the character of them, the cost of them, the necessity of them, and then let Congress determine whether the recommendations of the department are such as to meet its approval, or whether it will modify them so as to bring them within what would be determined to be reasonable and proper limits.

Here is authority to make a brigade post out of a regimental post without any limitation whatever upon the cost of the enterprise. It will always be in order on an appropriation bill to offer amendments to provide for increased expenditures at such posts. It is an indefensible policy to adopt and should not be approved by the House.

There is something else that shows the necessity of some definite policy. The House the other day passed a bill creating a commission to report to Congress, as I recall, by the 1st of May, as to the propriety of acquiring land near Birmingham, Ala., for the purpose of maneuver grounds for the troops. There is on the calendar, reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, a bill accepting 5,000 acres of land in the vicinity of Tullahoma, in the State of Tennessee, for the purpose of establishing "a maneuver camp for the maneuvering of troops, for establishing and maintaining camps of instruction, for rifle and artillery ranges, and for the purpose of assembling and mobilizing troops from the States of Tennessee, Kentucky, Alabama, Georgia, and South Carolina." That bill is next in order on the calendar, reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, and the gentlemen interested in the maneuvering grounds in Alabama have probably been caught napping; because, if this bill becomes a law, there will be absolutely no excuse for any commission to report to Congress, either before or after the 1st of May, as to the advisability of establishing another maneuver ground so near the one proposed at Tullahoma.

Mr. Chairman, it is apparent that before the Congress and this House enters upon the policy of authorizing these enlarged posts or additional maneuvering grounds, there should be formulated and laid before Congress a comprehensive scheme, which should be taken up by Congress and carefully worked out. Congress itself should adopt a policy and adhere to that policy.

The gravest indictment and the most severe criticism that can be made of the War Department is that it has no definite, permanent policy. Every time there is a change in the War Department, or a change in the offices of the General Staff, or in the head of the General Staff, a new policy is proposed, new schemes are introduced. Whatever one man advocates apparently is opposed by his successors. It seems to be the proof of progress. There is no continuity of policy here. Take the scheme in the Hawaiian Islands, to which I have referred. A plan for its proper defense, supposed to have been carefully worked out by the General Staff and in the War College established for that purpose, was laid before Congress. It was adopted. Yet, although in 1909 and in 1910 they advocated the immediate appropriation of money for Cavalry barracks, in 1911 they asked to have it diverted for Infantry barracks at Honolulu, a distance of some 12 miles from Camp Schofield, and then in 1912 the department comes back again and asks that additional authority be given for greater accommodations for Cavalry.

I do not wonder that in time of war, if this country is so unfortunate to be afflicted with it, the United States should be found unprepared in every department of the military service. If we are expending the vast sums that we do expend, and if we are educating officers at the expense to which we are put to have them study and determine military questions and they are unable overnight to confine themselves to any given policy or plan or scheme, it is no wonder that when war does come upon us we should have all the horrors and misfortunes that followed from the Spanish War.

Mr. Chairman, I believe it is unwise to pass this bill. In view of the fact that we have no definite information as to cost, and no definite information as to requirements, and there is no limitation upon the amount to be expended, with the likelihood of having within a few brief years a repetition of what has happened on former occasions, a change of policy, a change of control in the governing bodies in the War Department, and a recommendation that this system of brigade posts be abolished, and that some new or other system be established, action should be deferred until Congress changes the existing conditions. I hope the House will not pass the bill.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will ask the gentleman from New York how many of these little brigade posts which the gentleman speaks about have been established in the State of New York, and how many are now being constructed there?

Mr. FITZGERALD. There are none being constructed there. When the Army bill was under consideration, I did my best to get permission for the Secretary of War to negotiate for the sale of one post in the city of New York, so that Congress would not be plagued with it, but I could not do it. One of the posts in the State of New York, recommended for abandonment, to which I interposed no objection, is the Madison Barracks on Lake Champlain. One or two of these posts are in the vicinity of Buffalo. All of them are at least 400 miles from where I live.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. You have about six posts in the State of New York, and you have a group about Albany?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am in favor of abolishing many of them, not of enlarging them.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I have no objection to your having all the posts you have in New York; but with all those posts for the troops up there, where it costs four or five times the amount necessary in our country to keep them, I do not see why the gentleman from New York should be opposing a Cavalry post for all the Southeastern States.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know that I do object—

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. You have done it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not object to a post for Cavalry in the Southeastern States. If the department were to submit, and Congress were to adopt a definite policy, I should be very glad to support the action to be taken.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. But the gentleman is opposing the policy of the department which looks to that very thing.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have no confidence in the recommendations of the department now, and I do not see how anybody else can have any confidence in its recommendations.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. If the gentleman is going to take the position that the Secretary of War and all the people connected with the War Department are faithless and not worthy of consideration by this House, and that they are not properly discharging the duties of their office in connection with this matter or any other, then possibly the gentleman is right, but I do not concede that position.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not have to go that far. I think they are incompetent in many respects. They certainly have no definite, fixed policy. They fluctuate, they shift, they twist. The Secretary of War himself admits that present conditions grew up because of political pressure that could not be resisted by some distinguished gentlemen, so that I am not originating this charge.

One of the posts in the State of New York recommended for abandonment, since the gentleman refers to it, and to which I have interposed no objection, is the post on Lake Champlain, Madison Barracks, I believe, at Plattsburg. I know the reasons that have been urged for its abandonment, and I also know that after the War with Spain, when troops were sent back to this country in very bad condition of health, they were sent to Madison Barracks to recuperate. Whether it is necessary to have the barracks there in time of peace I have not said, but I made no objection to the abandonment of the post.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. It may be desirable to have that post at all times. I am making no objection. I am entirely willing that the great State of New York should have five posts; but I think the Representative from New York, who is no doubt honestly seeking to protect the interests of the Treasury, is a little bit extreme in opposing the unanimous report of a committee of this House that proposes merely to add two regiments to the one regimental post and create a brigade post for all these Southwestern States, in view of the statement of the Secretary of War on this subject, which the gentleman impeaches, but which I respect.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me say this, Mr. Chairman: I do not believe the number of posts located in the State from which I come should have any effect at all upon my attitude on this bill; and I know that it does not. The fact that it is proposed to locate this post at this particular point does not affect me at all. It is a question of the propriety of authorizing at this time the enlargement of any regimental post into a brigade post. I am inclined to believe—I am not quite certain, but I believe that when the Army appropriation bill passed a provision was inserted in it prohibiting the change of a regimental post into a brigade post. The gentleman from Virginia will recollect about that.

Mr. HAY. Yes; but this is doing just what that provision contemplated—that Congress is to act on these propositions.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; it is taking an isolated instance without having yet succeeded in discontinuing any of the other posts. I hope a good many will be discontinued, but none have yet been eliminated.

My experience has been that it is very unwise to start upon a new project until we have definitely eliminated the old one.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will yield.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman stated that before Congress acts the War Department should frame a definite policy, and he next stated that the War Department is inefficient and incapable to form a definite policy for the guidance of Congress. Now, where do we get on and where do we get off, according to the argument of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Pennsylvania may have heard what I said, but he evidently is incapable of repeating it. I did not say that the department was entirely incompetent. I have said that its action during the past three or four years shows that it has no definite policy, that it has fluctuated and shifted and trimmed from one side to the other, and if the papers I have called to the attention of the House, in one of the most important matters in connection with the defense of the country, do not demonstrate the accuracy of my statement, I do not know how it would be possible to demonstrate anything.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has stated definitely now that the War Department has fluctuated, trimmed, and shifted—

Mr. FITZGERALD. I say that.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Is not that equivalent to saying that it is incompetent? I do not agree with him, but ask the question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is supposed to have reasoning powers, and he can draw his own opinions. The ones I draw and wish to express I have never found any difficulty in doing so.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Would the gentleman from New York be willing to state whether he would support the policy of the department in an important measure if sent to this House through the proper channel?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I might. I did not on the Army appropriation bill, and neither did the majority of the House. What particular charm is there about the recommendations of the department now that it did not possess a few weeks since?

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. I do not think there is any particular charm attaching then that does not attach now, until I heard the argument of the gentleman from New York. He says that because of the absence of all these virtues and the recommendation of the War Department, the committee should not act.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I did not say anything of the kind. The gentleman can not state what I did say. My objection to the bill was not based on the action of the War Department. I have referred to the communication from the Secretary of War in reference to this new policy, but my objection is not based on that ground. I am sincere in my opposition to the bill, and some gentlemen here are sincere in their advocacy of it. I express the hope, Mr. Chairman, that until a definite, fixed policy regarding these posts is adopted by Congress, not by the War Department, these isolated cases will not be singled out and changes authorized without any knowledge as to what the limit of cost will be, without an estimate of what it is proposed to expend, without any limitation fixed by Congress as to what may be expended in the work. I reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for one hour.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, this is the first fruits of the widely heralded new policy of concentration of Army posts. Its consideration involves the question of the abandonment of posts in the Northwest as well as the building of a brigade post in Tennessee. This is some more of the policy of economy so loudly heralded on the other side of the aisle. In the interest of economy you give the War Department carte blanche to spend $5,000,000, for when you give the War Department authority to build a brigade post you give them authority to spend all the appropriations as they are made for barracks and quarters for the construction of that post. It costs about $5,000,000 to build a brigade post. When the military bill was under discussion a few days ago the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] offered an amendment that no part of the appropriation therein contained should be used for any purpose; that is, the appropriation for barracks and quarters, at certain named posts. I hope gentlemen will follow me. Those posts are as follows:

Fort Apache, Ariz.; Boise Barracks, Idaho; Fort Brady, Mich.; Fort Clark, Tex.; Fort George Wright, Wash.; Fort Jay, N. Y. (mobile garrison only); Fort Lincoln, N. Dak.; Fort Logan H. Roots, Ark.; Fort McIntosh, Tex.; Fort Mackenzie, Wyo.; Madison Barracks, N. Y.; Fort Meade, S. Dak.; Fort Niagara, N. Y.; Fort Ontario, N. Y.; Fort Wayne, Mich.; Whipple Barracks, Ariz.; Fort William Henry Harrison, Mont.; Fort Yellowstone, Wyo.; Fort Ethan Allen, Vt.; Plattsburg Barracks, N. Y.; Fort Robinson, Nebr.; Fort Missoula, Mont.; Fort Logan, Colo.; Fort Douglas, Utah; Fort D. A. Russell, Wyo.

Those posts, Mr. Chairman, have cost this Government, I think, about $22,000,000—between $22,000,000 and $25,000,000. With the exception of two or three small posts therein mentioned, they are all comparatively new, modern, up-to-date Army posts. Many of them have been practically rebuilt within 10 years, first class, with the latest specifications, located, many of them, on reservations of thousands of acres, located in an ideal climate, practically every one of them, for the housing and maneuvering of troops, and yet this House—no; not this House, but the Democratic side of this House which to-day brings in this bill—proposes that we shall not use a penny to stop a leak in the roofs of any of the Army buildings at these Army posts. In the interest of economy, twenty to twenty-five million dollars' worth of Government property is to go to rack and ruin, and at the same time, in the interest of economy, I assume, the War Department is to be given the power to build a $5,000,000 Army post. Why do I say a $5,000,000 Army post? There are at this time four brigade posts in the United States—four posts that may properly be called brigade posts. Fort D. A. Russell, Wyo., is one of them. It has cost up to this time $4,925,000 in round numbers. Fort Leavenworth, Kans., is a brigade post. It has cost $4,263,000 in round numbers.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. In a moment. Fort Sam Houston, Tex., is a brigade post, and it has cost $3,625,000 in round numbers. Fort Riley, Kans., is larger than a regimental post; it has cost $3,491,000. So that a brigade post means an expenditure of approximately $5,000,000. Now, I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HELM. What is the capacity of Fort Leavenworth?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman's committee made a most exhaustive report on that subject a short time ago. If I had the time I should be very glad to quote from it, but I do not have in mind now the exact capacity of Fort Leavenworth; but Fort Leavenworth has the capacity for approximately the number of troops provided for in this bill. It is, in other words, a brigade post, and so known in the Army. Fort D. A. Russell is the newest brigade post. It has cost almost exactly $5,000,000.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman state that Fort D. A. Russell has the capacity to quarter a brigade?

Mr. MONDELL. No; I think it has not. I was giving the gentleman the benefit of the doubt. I was giving the cost of posts known as brigade posts. I think perhaps none of them have the capacity of quartering a brigade; and if the gentleman desires to have me amend my figures and say that a brigade post will cost $8,000,000 or $9,000,000—and there is no limit on the amount the department might expend—I am perfectly willing to take the gentleman's estimate, whatever it is, provided it is above the amount which it has cost to build the posts which are now called brigade posts. The post which it is proposed to enlarge into a brigade post has cost up to this time $1,101,000 in round numbers. So that, assuming that the expenditure which we are authorizing to meet the difference between the cost of this post as it now stands and the usual cost of a brigade post, the very least that the bill authorizes is the expenditure of $4,000,000, and it will not require another line of legislation to authorize the expenditure of that amount of money.

I said this was the first fruits of the new policy of concentration and economy. That is not entirely accurate. It is about the third blossom, but it seems to be the first to approach fruition. There have been passed through the House a resolution, or have been reported two—one looking to the purchase of maneuver grounds in Tennessee, the other authorizing investigations which are expected to lead to the purchase of large areas in Alabama for maneuver grounds. Of course that means, in the due course of events, the erection of Army posts. So, in the interests of economy, we are proposing to encourage the War Department to abandon twenty to twenty-five million dollars' worth of up-to-date military property in the Northwest and to spend millions to establish new Army posts in other parts of the country. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has made some statement with regard to the policies of the War Department. I want to record my assent to his statement. I suppose the gentlemen on the General Staff of the War Department must have something to occupy their time, and consequently every so often the Congress has presented to it some new and weird proposition of change of organization or for housing the Army. If we were to follow all of the changing moods of the military and the gentlemen from civil life connected from time to time with the War Department our military organization would be a hodgepodge that would be a spectacle worth going miles to see.

Why, take, for example, their suggestion as to the abandonment of Army posts in the Northwest. Fort Yellowstone is a child of the Army. No political influence had anything to do with the building of Fort Yellowstone. So far as I know no mere politician suggested the building of an Army post at Fort Yellowstone. The department spent about $650,000 for the building of an Army post there, and they spent it properly, because I know of no better location for an Army post than at Fort Yellowstone. The climate is ideal for the recuperation of troops. It is a place where men grow strong, hardy, and vigorous in that mountain climate. The Cavalry stationed there is occupied in policing a great national pleasure ground. It is an ideal post from the standpoint of the troops, and the troops there are about the only ones in the entire Army who are really performing valuable service in time of peace. And yet the War Department having, on its own motion and without suggestion from anyone, spent nearly three-quarters of a million dollars at Fort Yellowstone, having there an ideal Army post, perfect and up-to-date buildings, a large reservation, an ideal location, proposes to abandon the property, and it will be utterly valueless and worthless when abandoned. At least it will bring no return to the Treasury of the United States. Abandon Fort Yellowstone for what? For a proposed policy of concentration.

The abandonment of the northern and northwestern posts, they tell us, is in the interests of economy and for the purpose of concentration, but the first recommendation we have from the War Department has nothing to do with the policy of concentration. The policy of concentration, as I understand it, contemplates the building of barracks and quarters in or immediately adjacent to great cities and allow the officers commutation of quarters in order that they may live in the city. That is the department's idea of concentration. They want to get away from the rural denizens of the agricultural districts and establish quarters for our Army in the slums or adjacent to the slums of great cities, in order, I presume, that the officers, in addition to their other advantages, may be given the opportunity to attend the opera and enjoy all the delights of large cities. They have been proposing to take the American soldier away from the isolated posts, where he is free from the temptations of great cities, away from the mountains and the plains, where he enjoys a bracing, delightful, healthful climate, and put him in the midst of all the temptations of great cities and congregate him in great units. While that is the theory, the moment some gentleman of the majority approaches the War Department with a proposition not of concentration, but a proposition for shifting the present scattered Army posts to another part of the country, the War Department finds it in its heart to adjust its theory of concentration to the theory of scattering the Army posts in other portions of the country than that in which they are located. That is all that is proposed.

That is all this proposes. Concentration! Why, they are not even satisfied to have the new buildings located adjacent to the buildings already erected. They can scatter them all about on this 8,000 acres of land which the Government owns and spend all the money that we shall appropriate for the next 10 years for barracks and quarters in building up this great post down there in Tennessee, leaving, I suppose, the splendid posts of the North and Northwest tenantless, inhabited by bats, open to the winds of heaven. What matters the throwing away of twenty or twenty-five million dollars of Government money? The people pay it and our salary runs on just the same. Why not toss a $5,000,000 Army post to the winds every morning and establish a new one in the district of some gentleman who may desire it?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Does the gentleman mean to say that the purpose of passing this bill is to get somebody back to Congress?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I have such very high regard for my friend from Tennessee and so great a desire that he may come back that if there is anything in what I have said that would convey that idea I will take it back.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I do not want the gentleman to say it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. I did not have the gentleman from Tennessee in my mind in connection with my remarks.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. It was my bill, and therefore I thought the gentleman had me in mind.

Mr. MONDELL. No; because high as is my regard for my other colleagues there is none for whom I have a higher regard than the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Moon]. [Applause.] It is because I have so high a regard for him that I regret exceedingly that I feel it my duty to oppose this measure as vigorously as I can.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I thank the gentleman for his high regard, but I hope it will not increase any more. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. I have a great regard for the gentleman from Tennessee. I also have a great regard for the welfare of the people and for the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, the whole theory of so-called concentration is un-American. It is simply an attempt to ape the methods of the military-ridden, military-burdened monarchies of Europe. If we did not have an Army post to-day in the United States, if we were now free to outline a plan for the housing of the Army, in my opinion the Army should be housed practically as it is to-day, with the posts scattered throughout the country, and particularly in those portions of the country where the Government has large reservations, where the climate is healthful and invigorating, where troops can be maintained at a comparatively small cost, where the Army of the United States shall be available as a model for the National Guard, where the Army may be so scattered among the body of the people that in case of war the Army posts can be utilized as points for the recruiting of volunteers scattered throughout the agricultural regions of the country, from which we receive the bulk and the best of our Volunteer Army, where they are easily accessible for the maneuvers of the National Guard, and where they are conveniently located for the purposes of concentration in time of war.

We have in Wyoming a brigade post, the finest in the Union. I realize that there is no danger of its being abandoned. Secretaries of War may suggest and Democratic majorities may attempt to hasten that sort of thing, but we are not going to abandon $5,000,000 worth of property situated on the main transcontinental lines of the United States—north and south and east and west—even in connection with some weird plan of concentrating the Army in the slums of great cities. The War Department may not know it, but it is a fact that it is the same distance across the continent with Army posts located midway between the two oceans as it is across the continent if an Army post were located in one corner of the country. In case of an outbreak requiring our troops on the Pacific coast it will cost quite as much and considerably more to bring troops from Fort Oglethorpe than to transport them from Fort D. A. Russell, Wyo. And in the case of trouble on the Canadian border the cost of transportation would be greatly increased.

But gentlemen have heard of the reclamation law. In their wanderings throughout the country, having occasionally got away from the attractions of the large cities, they have run across some reclamation projects somewhere, and it has occurred to them that inasmuch as the Government is hoping to recoup its expenditures made in the irrigation of lands, it may recoup its expenditures in the abandonment of Army posts in the same way.

I imagine the people of the country are simply falling over each other to buy old abandoned Army posts. There may be an Army post somewhere in the United States for which we could get a few dollars if it were abandoned. Some of the posts in New York State were granted with a reversionary clause, and if they are abandoned I assume they go back to the original owners, buildings and all. There was a post recently abandoned in Texas, and I think one of the gentlemen from that State has a bill proposing to turn it over to the State of Texas. Unless there are some unusual conditions there, I think that is a very proper way to dispose of it. You could dispose of all the Army posts that way, except those that the States would consider white elephants and would not have anything to do with.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Fort Elliott, in my district, was abandoned a few years ago, and also Fort Richardson, and those buildings brought the Government practically not 1 cent of what they originally cost the Government.

Mr. MONDELL. No one who has any knowledge of what has occurred in previous abandonments or has any knowledge of the surroundings and conditions of Army posts imagines for a moment that any sum worth considering could be secured by the sale of these posts. The Government may have a small tract of land somewhere which could be sold for a considerable sum of money. If there is such a tract, it is probably one which the Government can very well afford to keep and have in reserve in case of war, when depots for supplies may be needed.

Mr. KAHN. Does the gentleman recall the case of Fort Walla Walla, which was abandoned a few years ago? There was a proposition to turn the fort over to Whitman College. I think $121,000 had been expended on the post in the shape of new construction about two years before it was abandoned. Whitman College made an effort to secure the land, but some real-estate dealers in Walla Walla began to put up the price of the land, and I believe they finally offered something like $350 an acre for it; so that is one post, at any rate, where the Government is going to get some value for its property.

Mr. MONDELL. There may be some Army posts where the Government can sell a little property for town sites. An Army post which cost the Government nearly half a million dollars in my own State was abandoned some years ago and ceded to the State. It has been somewhat of a white elephant on the hands of the State ever since.

A MEMBER. Cede it back.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman says "cede it back." I think we would have to do it when there was nobody on the floor of the House that understood the situation. I do not think that the Government wants to be handicapped with that sort of property. Army posts are, in the main, a considerable distance from the large cities. The War Department suggests that we might use them for the purpose of suburban residences. Imagine the splendid Army post in the district of my friend from South Dakota being used for the purpose of suburban residences. It is now an up-to-date post, in a delightful climate, with a large reservation, with enormous forest reserves immediately adjacent.

No finer place for maneuvers could be imagined than in that territory belonging to the Government immediately adjacent to this post. And that is so with nearly all the northwestern posts, which have, most of them, large reservations and near them great mountain forest reserves, an ideal location for maneuvers, where the Government owns millions of acres of land, where maneuvers of all kinds can be carried on without the danger of trespassing on any man's property.

Furthermore, they are in a territory where there is often use for the Army in fighting great forest fires. A year ago last fall, up in Idaho and northern Montana the troops proved themselves exceedingly useful and valuable in helping to put out the forest fires.

In several instances the troops were the only considerable body of men available in the first instance, and except for the presence of detachments of Cavalry and Infantry the fires, which destroyed millions of dollars worth of Government property in timber, would have destroyed very much larger areas of Government timber.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Is the gentleman aware also that the department is committed to the policy of ordering these troops to put out these fires wherever they can be reached?

Mr. MONDELL. I think the department has never at any time declined to cooperate with the Forest Service where a request has been made, and ordinarily the men are glad to do it, because it gives them exercise and gets them out into the field.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. KAHN. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that in fighting forest fires many soldiers have lost their uniforms, or, at any rate, their uniforms were so seriously damaged that they had to be replaced. The War Department recommended that the soldiers be paid for this damage, and they ought to be paid. I have not heard that any bill has been brought in by any committee of this House to refund this money to the soldiers, and I dare say that much of the enthusiasm that they have displayed heretofore in putting out forest fires will be dampened in the future if they find that when their uniforms are ruined in doing such good work they will not be paid for the destruction.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, the enlisted men of the United States Army are fine fellows, and I think they would be glad to help put out forest fires even though they might get their uniforms smudged a little. Of course, if any uniforms have been lost or seriously damaged in that way the Government should replace them.

As I said a moment ago, this is one of the first fruits of the proposed imitation of the plans and policies of the armies of military monarchies in Europe. Because in Europe they concentrate their troops in large garrison towns, forsooth, it is a good thing to do in the United States; and yet the very committee that reported the bill encouraging the War Department to move in the direction of that kind of a policy did not have enough confidence in the War Department to leave them free to change the Army uniforms.

If we need any new military posts I have no objection to their being in the hills of Tennessee or Georgia, if they have a country down there that is suitable for the housing of troops, healthful, invigorating in climate. I have no objection to our having any number of Army posts there if we need them, but I do object to the Government abandoning its first-class and up-to-date property in the Northwest along the Canadian border, on the plains, in the mountains, in the finest climate in the world in which to grow and train men. Abandon them, turn them over to the owls and the bats, and then give the War Department an opportunity to spend $5,000,000 for building an Army post somewhere else. One of the finest Army posts anywhere in the country is in the district of my friend from Colorado on the other side of the aisle, a fine post centrally situated in a fine climate.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL (continuing). And in every way suitable for a military post, with new buildings, and yet if they leak, they must continue to leak because the War Department is prohibited from repairing them.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. MONDELL. I do.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I think the gentleman said that Fort D. A. Russell was the newest brigade post. Fort Logan, I believe, is the newest regimental post, and it is an up-to-date post, and yet within the last two years it was reduced from a regimental post to a recruiting station, and there are over $500,000,000 of the Government's money in the mint at Denver unprotected by any troops other than by those at Fort D. A. Russell.

Mr. MONDELL. All a mistake; all of this policy of so-called concentration is a mistake, from anybody's standpoint, except from the standpoint of officers who do not get close enough to the American people to understand the theory on which we maintain the Regular Army Establishment. We do not have to mass our troops on the borders of a hostile enemy, as France and Germany are compelled to do, or as they feel they are compelled to do. We are not compelled, thank God, to mass our troops in the vicinity of great cities to put down riot, and I hope the day will never come when that will be necessary in this country. We maintain our Army as the nucleus of a war establishment.

It should be scattered, not too widely; there should be some brigade posts; and if we needed another brigade post I would have no objection to have it at the point suggested by this bill; but, in the main, the regimental post is the ideal post for an Army like ours. It brings the soldier in contact with the citizens; it places him where he is available in the training of the National Guard; in case of war the various posts may be used as points of rendezvous. It brings the citizen soldiers together and trains them for warfare. Our distributed system of military posts is not an accident. It is the result of carrying out of the fixed policy of the American people touching our military establishment, and it will not be departed from, in my opinion. Following the suggestion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], I shall not be at all surprised if within a year we should have recommendations from the War Department for the regarrisoning of posts heretofore abandoned.

Fort Assiniboine, for instance, up on the Canadian border, in Montana, no more ideal location for troops on earth than that great post; up to date, splendid buildings, and I think there are some 25,000 or 30,000 acres of land or more for which the Government is going to get nothing. It will be settled upon, it is now settled upon, and it will be taken under the homestead law.

Our present distribution of the Army is ideal. The troops ought not to be permanently kept in large bodies. It is not in the interests of the military establishment or the morale of the Army that they should be. And it is easy to bring them to common maneuver grounds. Out in the Dakotas, and in Wyoming, and in Montana, and up north along the Canadian border in New York, there are innumerable localities where troops can be cheaply assembled and where, in connection with the National Guard, maneuvers can be carried on to the advantage of the National Guard and of the Regular Army.

In my opinion we will not depart from our past policy—no matter who may temporarily recommend it—in this bill.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman seems to be so thoroughly informed that I would like to have his views on the practical disadvantages of concentration of these troops.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has nine minutes remaining.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, there are innumerable objections to concentration. In the first place, the proposed concentration means the abandonment of at least twenty-five to fifty millions of dollars of Government property for which I do not believe the Government would receive a million dollars all told. It means the expenditure of at least $50,000,000 to erect the buildings necessary for the proposed concentration. And when it is done, what have you? The massing of troops in the vicinity of large cities. The idea is, I believe, that officers be given commutation of quarters, as they are in Europe, so that they can live in the cities.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman believe actual economy in the matter of administration would result from concentration?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not. The War Department says they can save two and one-half millions of dollars in the matter of transportation. If there is anyone under heaven who can explain how that can be done I shall be glad to be convinced. Say we have five great Army posts and it is necessary to move the troops, or advisable to move them, as we do now, from one post to another occasionally. Is the map going to be shrunk any by this policy of concentration? It is going to be just as far between two given points as it is now. Will it cost any less to move a brigade from the proposed post to the Pacific coast than it would be to move the same brigade from two or three posts nearer the Pacific coast?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. If the gentleman will yield at that point, I would like to say that the figures of the War Department on this subject, or of the board, appear to be that they would spend 90 per cent and only save 10 per cent, evidently made up on the theory that after they got the troops concentrated in a few large posts they will simply keep them there.

I think the experience in the last year shows just what would happen under that system as compared with the present system. Last year we wanted troops upon the Mexican border, and they had to be taken there, and it would have cost the Government just as much to have taken the troops down there from a few large centers as it did cost to take them from the various posts from which they came. I know from personal observation that the troops from the intermountain posts were among the first to get their entire regiments upon the Mexican border. They got there just as quickly and just as economically as they could have been brought from any part of the United States.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the whole thing is ridiculous beyond words. I am amazed that any officer would put his name to the suggestion that by concentration you would reduce the cost of the transportation of the Army, as my friend from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN] says, nine-tenths of its present cost.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. MONDELL. With pleasure.

Mr. TILSON. Did I understand the gentleman from South Dakota to say that the troops from the northwestern posts reached Texas as quickly as any troops from other parts of the country?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. In substance, I said that the getting of the troops from the intermountain posts to the Mexican border was accomplished with the same promptness as the getting of the troops there from the other parts of the country.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, we never will have an Army so large but that in time of war all available troops must be utilized. Is there anyone who proposes an Army so large that if we are attacked in Florida, for example, we will use only the troops from the proposed post of concentration in that neighborhood; that if we are attacked on the Mexican border we will use only the troops stationed in Texas; and if we are attacked on the Northern border we will use only the troops from the posts located in that neighborhood? No. Nobody proposes that. We shall never have an Army large enough but that in case of hostilities the whole Army will have to be moved. And how, under Heaven, can you move the troops more cheaply if you have them concentrated in five or six camps on the borders of the country than you can if they are scattered generally throughout the country? There, gentlemen, is a proposition in mathematics which the gentlemen of the War Department will need more time than they have as yet taken to work out.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. KAHN. I think the gentleman misunderstands the policy of the War Department in regard to the moving of troops. The policy, as I understand it, is this: When one of these brigade posts shall be established, then it will be the policy of the War Department to get the recruits that may be enlisted for the Army within the vicinity of that brigade post into that brigade post, and thereby save a great deal of money for transportation, instead of sending the recruits to a far distant post.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. It will work just the other way.

Mr. MONDELL. Why, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from California does not certainly agree with that proposition. Where do we secure our recruits? From the body of the people in all parts of the country. The cheapest way to secure recruits and have them brought to the posts where they can be trained is to have the posts scattered throughout the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Instead of it being a measure of economy it would greatly add to the expense.

Mr. KAHN. The testimony before is that most of the troops come from the large cities.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not understand that is true.

Mr. LOBECK. It is not true in time of war.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to address the House any further on this subject of the Army posts, but it seems to me that, in view of the position that some of the Members are taking on the subject, something ought to be said to correct what I believe is an entirely mistaken idea, and especially the views expressed by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]. It seems to me that it is such a simple proposition, in its last analysis, that the concentration of these troops in a few quarters is a cheaper proposition than keeping them in 176 different quarters, that it ought to go without saying. The illustration of the proposition might be stated in this way: Here are a man and his wife with five or six children. Would it be a matter of economy to maintain a separate establishment for every child in the family? Remember that the War Department is spending millions of dollars for heating, lighting, plumbing, furnishing, and equipment, and all the running expenses connected with the establishment. If it would not be economical in the case of one family, then if you multiply that proposition by 10,000, you can at once grasp what it means to be keeping these troops in this multiplicity of places.

The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] seems to think that this entire proposition hinges upon the question of the transportation of troops. As I have stated before on the floor, these Army quarters are comparable to small towns or cities. You have expensive heating and lighting plants. You must have your waterworks, your reservoirs, your sewage system, and miles of roads and concrete sidewalks at every one of them. The question of transportation enters but a small way into the proposition of maintaining the troops in these quarters.

I do not want to make war on any man's pet project in the shape of an Army post. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] lauds and praises these posts that are situated out in the Northwest. I do not vouch for the statement, but I hear it here and there—on the wings of the wind, in the language of Henry Watterson—that the winds are so severe in those Northwestern States that they actually drive the soldiers crazy. The only recommendation that the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] can give for his pet project is that it has a good climate. I submit to the intelligence of this House that there are other more vital elements for consideration than climate. You can not live by bread alone, and you can not maintain an Army post simply for climatic reasons. It can not subsist simply because it has a good climate. There is a great deal of good climate in this country.

Now, I want to make this further suggestion to the gentleman from Wyoming: It is your baby that you are spanking here. This War Department, that you say is so badly out of joint, has been under the control and administration of the Republican Party for over 16 years, and all of these mishaps and misadventures of which you are hearing on the floor of the House belong on the doorsteps of the Republican Party. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is also aware of the fact that the War Department never got wrong in these matters until we got a Democratic majority in the House to influence the Democratic majority in the War Department.

Mr. HELM. It is a wonderful influence that the Democratic majority in the House has on the War Department.

Mr. MONDELL. It seems to be remarkable.

Mr. HELM. The Democratic majority found a condition to exist there which was in existence long before there was any Democratic majority. In the language of a very distinguished gentleman, we simply turned on the light, and lo and behold, according to the statement of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], what have you?

Now, I want to remind this House once more that since the 1st day of May, 1898, the day of the Battle of Manila, the War Department has expended $2,149,275,766.11, and the military establishment of the War Department has expended $1,456,000,000. When I say the War Department, that includes the civil establishment, the entire expense. The military establishment relates exclusively to the maintenance of the Army.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HELM. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. I assume that because of the fact that the military establishment has cost a great deal of money, the gentleman feels justified in supporting a measure which will take $5,000,000 more out of the Treasury in order that it may be wasted in additional Army posts.

Mr. HELM. The answer to that is that whenever you, as a business man are conducting a business that is losing money, will you continue to run the business or quit it and get out of it? Here you are; you can not deny the fact that this Government is spending a stupendous, a staggering sum of money, and what have you for it?

Mr. MONDELL. We have got some mighty good Army posts up in the Northwest that they propose to abandon and build some others down in Tennessee.

Mr. HELM. But you can not make an army out of army posts alone. The Army is a fighting machine. An army is in battle what the twine binder or the thrashing machine is to the farmer at harvest time. When your machine does not give good results, it does not pay any man to fool with that machine. He is losing time, he is losing money and wasting his crops. The Army as such is intended to fight with, and here is the statement of a man who has been 21 years in the service of the Government in the War Department, who has devoted his life work to the study of military affairs, and I am going to take the time to read a few extracts from his statement to show you that you have not an army and you never will have an army, and the reason that you can not have an army is because you are going in the very opposite direction from that which you should go. You are practicing a system that destroys an army instead of making one. As long as you quarter your Army in these scattered Army posts you may spend $2,000,000,000 and you can not have an army. It is the most gigantic, stupendous, monumental piece of stupidity, I think, that a government ever stood for.

Using again my illustration to the gentleman from Wyoming, did you ever play football—ever see a game played by trained experts? Do not you know that these men have to work months and months together in teamwork? Here you have a division, a so-called division of the Army, known as the eastern division of the Army, scattered from Canada to the tip end of Florida, but you have not anything in it that resembles a division.

Scattered all over the country here and there are a few companies that I doubt ever saw each other. Now, you are going to set them in a game and play the game. You go to Maine and California and gather up a few football players and bring them to Washington to play against a trained team, and what kind of success would you have? The mere statement of the case furnishes the answer.

Now, I want to read something that this officer says. I am reading from the statement made by Maj. Shelton. Many of you no doubt know him.

Mr. MURRAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HELM. With pleasure.

Mr. MURRAY. Before the gentleman reads the extract I want to make a suggestion to him for the purpose of getting clearly in my mind the absolute necessity of a much greater establishment of the Regular Army than the gentleman seems to advocate. If we are to have the mobilized forces and still have the same degree of protection that we are now fortunate enough to have in the protection from foreign foes in the country, may I ask whether or not we could maintain in this country a standing Army large enough to protect the country and still have the same efficiency that the gentleman says is so essential?

Mr. HELM. The question of the gentleman is somewhat involved and is not intended to be taken seriously. No one expects the Army to be converted into a quasi fire department; but I will say this to the gentleman, that one well-organized division of the Army in tactical organization is worth more than all that you have now in its present shape. In other words, one division of our Army organized and in fighting trim is worth more to the United States than the four divisions that you have with no organization.

Mr. MURRAY. Well, surely that division would not be of much value if it were on the eastern border for the purpose of protecting the western border of the country.

Mr. HELM. Does the gentleman mean to say that the soldier has to fight fire or anything in his own back yard in order to put up a fight?

Mr. MURRAY. Well, the soldier who is wise, if I have been correct in my reading of military warfare, picks out his own back yard rather than the other fellow's back yard and tries to get him in it.

Mr. HELM. Does the gentleman think that because he could fight well on the Atlantic coast he could not on the Pacific coast; that his training that he has had on the Atlantic coast would not train him to fight on the Pacific coast?

Mr. MURRAY. Not so; but it will take some time to take him over there. In other words, if you are going to have a system of large organizations in separate places the places must be very few, and a tremendous number of places must be left unprotected, and therefore it is unwise to maintain mobilized centers with so many other places unprotected.

Mr. HELM. Well, I am a little unfortunate in not following the gentleman as well as I might have done, but I understand that it is the present intention of the War Department to maintain as many of the troops on the Pacific side as it does on the Atlantic side so that if there is any occasion for troops on the Pacific side, why, there they are. They would be trained as efficiently on the Atlantic side as on the Pacific side, and vice versa.

Mr. MURRAY. Now, the purpose of my inquiry is to determine whether or not they can do that without a tremendous increase of the present force.

Mr. HELM. There is no occasion for an increase in the force. What you want is organization of your present force.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HELM. A small organization organized for fighting purposes, on fighting lines, on a fighting footing, is better than a large organization which is unorganized.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HELM. I do with more than usual pleasure.

Mr. KAHN. Thank you. As I understood the gentleman, his contention is that the Army should be organized either into tactical or geographical units. Is that the position of the gentleman?

Mr. HELM. Never into geographical; what has geography got to do with the Army? That is what you have done; you have got it on geographical lines.

Mr. KAHN. Does not Maj. Shelton, from whom the gentleman is going to quote, say that the Army ought to be organized either into tactical or geographical units? Does he not say so specifically?

Mr. HELM. Tactical; not geographical.

Mr. KAHN. I think if the gentleman will read Maj. Shelton's testimony—

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman explain to me what geography has to do with organization?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly I will. At present there are three divisions of the Army—one on the Atlantic seaboard, one in the center of the country, and one on the Pacific slope.

Mr. HELM. What does that mean; what does it amount to?

Mr. KAHN. Now, the idea is to concentrate in each one of those divisions enough troops to organize the troops within the geographical district into tactical units, so that there will be a proper proportion of Infantry, Cavalry, and Artillery in each geographical division.

Mr. HELM. Now, what has geography to do with that?

Mr. KAHN. Well, I have just explained to the gentleman.

Mr. HELM. You can organize without dividing the United States into three equal parts. The fact that you have started out by dividing the United States into three equal parts has nothing to do with the proposition.

Mr. KAHN. That is the way in which the United States is divided at the present time.

Mr. HELM. What does it amount to; what do you get out of it; what ice does it cut, to put it that way?

Mr. KAHN. The War Department officials say it is a question of economy; that instead of having five or six departments, as they had a few years ago, they were now dividing the country into three divisions for the sake of economy.

Mr. HELM. Now, what does the division of the country into three sections save?

Mr. KAHN. It makes for economy in the matter of administration very largely and in the matter of distribution of troops.

Mr. HELM. As a matter of fact, to give you just an instance that these geographical divisions do not make for economy, there is a vacancy created either by death or by promotion of an officer who belongs to an organization of the eastern division, and his successor will, perhaps, be in or come from the western division—

Mr. KAHN. You mean that he is detailed in the western division?

Mr. HELM. (continuing). And he goes to his assignment there. Now, this geographical division does not reduce his traveling expenses. The fact that you divide the country into three parts does not get any results for you at all. A complete tactical organization, without reference to geography, is the thing desired. Now, I hope I have in a measure answered you, and I would like to proceed.

Mr. KAHN. I can not quite catch the drift of the gentleman's argument.

Mr. HELM. I must confess I am a little unable to understand the meaning of the gentleman's question, except that he just divides the country into three parts, and therefore you have an army.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman knows that the country is divided into three parts now by the War Department, does he not?

Mr. HELM. Yes; but it does not amount to a rap for any purpose.

Mr. KAHN. Then I entirely misunderstand the gentleman. What does the gentleman propose to do? Does he propose to put our Army up in the air or put it down to the bottom of the sea? Where does he propose to put it. If it does not have to do with geography at all, where is he going to put his Army?

Mr. HELM. Naturally, it has to have a habitat, of course. It must have one.

Mr. KAHN. It does have a habitat at the present time—one division is in the East, one in the middle of the country, and one in the West.

Mr. HELM. It is scattered here, there, and everywhere.

Mr. KAHN. Is not the department trying to concentrate the Army in those three divisions?

Mr. HELM. I trust they are trying. It is time—

Mr. KAHN. When they have concentrated it in those three divisions is it not the policy of the department to reorganize the Army in each one of those divisions into tactical units so that it can be expanded or contracted when the occasion may require?

Mr. HELM. I understand you to say it is the intention of the department to do that?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. HELM. Then I would infer it has not done that.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman was going to read from Maj. Shelton, who was one of the strongest advocates of that policy.

Mr. HELM. I hope the gentleman feels satisfied with the position that he has taken and will let me proceed now.

Mr. KAHN. I thank the gentleman for yielding so much of his time to me.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. Thirty-eight minutes.

Mr. HELM. I will yield.

Mr. MURRAY. Is it not a fact that the principal value of the Regular Army is as a nucleus for a volunteer army in time of conflict?

Mr. HELM. An army is worth nothing as a nucleus. An army is a finished product, so to speak. The more of a nucleus it is, the worse it is. The nearer you approach a nucleus, the less you approach an army.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HELM. I have been quite liberal as to time. Let me read this, and then I will yield.

Maj. Shelton, being before the committee, was questioned along this line:

The CHAIRMAN. Including the time that you were at West Point, how long have you been connected with the service?

Maj. SHELTON. Nearly 21 years.

The CHAIRMAN. And you have devoted your life work to the study of the Army?

Maj. SHELTON. Yes, sir; to the study of the Army.

The CHAIRMAN. And you are necessarily familiar with its present organization?

Maj. SHELTON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Explain that to the committee as fully as you can.

Maj. SHELTON. Our present organization of the Army can be described very briefly. We have no organization of the Army as an army whatsoever.

The CHAIRMAN. Why? What is the defect or reason that we have none?

Maj. SHELTON. If we will stop for a moment to consider what an army is I think it will make my meaning clearer. An army is simply a machine—a human machine, it is true, but a machine—made up of many different parts; and these different parts are groups of men, each of which is designed to fit into its place in the complete machine. Therefore, just as with any other piece of machinery, unless each part is fitted to its place, and unless all the parts are on hand and properly assembled, the machine will not run. Our Army is not an army to-day, because, while it has practically all of the different parts of the whole, these parts have never been fitted into any place in the whole, nor has the whole ever been assembled, nor have we ever tried to operate the whole machine. Until we do this we have no army; and until we have an army, regardless of its size, we have got nothing in the way of collective military efficiency. We have individual efficiency, I think; we have highly qualified men and highly qualified officers. It could hardly be otherwise with our requirements, which are severe in both cases; but individual efficiency is not enough. Unless we can collect these individuals and make them all move together for the same purpose, we have not an efficient service; and we can not, under our present system, collect these various individuals and groups of individuals and use them for the true purpose of an army.

The CHAIRMAN. As I understand you, under the present arrangement, the Army is not efficient as an organization?

Maj. SHELTON. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the present arrangement of the Army result in the unnecessary expenditure of money?

Maj. SHELTON. Yes, sir.

Now, I could read you much more of the statement of Maj. Shelton, putting the proposition more strongly than the passage I have read to you. There is not a particle of doubt in my mind—and I am not posing here before the House as a man of any military experience at all—that a great deal of the criticism that has been made on the floor concerning the Army is well taken. I do not believe that the officers of the Army themselves will undertake to defend existing conditions in the Army. The time has come, and it is right here, when we must face about and get better results for the money that is being expended.

Yesterday on the floor the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] told of being at Fort Monroe and standing on the fort with some naval officers, and he quotes those officers as saying that that fort was not strong enough or sufficient to defend Hampton Roads. Here is Gen. Wood's statement before this committee that it is a well-equipped fortification; that every one of these Artillery posts can defend itself against a fleet of Dreadnoughts; and that particularly Fort Monroe is one of the best forts on the Atlantic coast, and that it could defend itself against a fleet of Dreadnoughts.

Now, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania has quoted the officers of the Navy correctly, and Gen. Wood has certainly made the statement, because I read it to you yesterday, there you have the House of Representatives placed in the position of depending upon these different departments for information, and one of them comes up here and says one thing and another one comes along and denies it and says an entirely different thing. What better result can you expect than what you are getting under such conditions? In order to act wisely you must at least have accurate information.

Coming down particularly to this bill that we have up for consideration, as a general proposition I am in favor of this concentration. The letter of the Secretary of War mentions Fort Oglethorpe as a proper place for the concentration of troops. So far I am inclined to think that it is a good proposition, but whether you are going at this proposition in the right manner is the thing to be considered. I am inclined to agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] that time should be taken, thought should be had, and this proposition should be thought out carefully for once. The Army should take Congress more into its confidence, it seems to me. Let Congress and the Army understand each other. Let Congress know what the War Department intends, or what policy it has in view, and how it proposes to carry it out. If that were done, I believe the demands of the Army would receive a better response in Congress than they receive to-day.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. HELM. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is not in the House, but the gentleman from Kentucky has referred to a statement made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania on the floor yesterday. I am sure that the gentleman from Kentucky does not want to do that gentleman an injustice.

Mr. HELM. No, sir.

Mr. KAHN. I desire to call to his attention exactly what the gentleman from Pennsylvania said in regard to Fort Monroe. I read from page 2518 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have not raised that question at all. I had reference to the other side of the water toward Cape Henry. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia proposed to fortify the Cape Henry side. I have raised no question as to the sufficiency of the fortifications at Fortress Monroe, but I do raise the question, as the gentleman from Virginia does, with regard to the nonprotected coast on the Cape Henry side.

Mr. HELM. Does not the gentleman from California find the place there where the gentleman from Pennsylvania says that Fort Monroe is not sufficient or able to defend Portsmouth? In other words, he said that a Dreadnought could pass Fort Monroe and go into Portsmouth, provided you had a fog made to order.

Mr. KAHN. He said in effect that somebody had made a statement that that was so, and then he goes on to make this statement which I have just read. I will read what was said if the gentleman from Kentucky will permit.

Mr. HELM. Oh, I have been quite liberal with the gentleman from California, and it is far from me to do the gentleman from Pennsylvania an injustice. I think the gentleman from California will find there that the gentleman from Pennsylvania says Fort Monroe is not sufficient to protect Hampton Roads.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania said:

It was stated on this last visit of mine to Fort Monroe that we were not adequately protected, and that in the event of darkness or possibly fog it would be easy for an enemy to go into Chesapeake Bay and begin the bombardment of Norfolk.

He does not himself state that he found it so.

Mr. HELM. Some officer told him that.

Now, Mr. Chairman, here is one of the most strategic points along the Atlantic coast, Cape Henry, and yet, if there is any weight or importance to be placed upon the statements of these officers, it would appear that instead of having fortified the gate, we have fortified the back door, so to speak.

It looks to me about as sensible for a banker to leave open the vaults of his bank and lock the directors' room. When you construct a fort 12 miles away from the entrance to the harbor, the invader is allowed to enter the vault, so to speak. I did not intend going into this, but it strikes me that there is need of some good headwork down there in that department somewhere—that we need more headwork and less expenditure of money.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], in discussing the fortification bill, said there had been $49,000,000 spent on the Atlantic coast, and, according to the conditions, here is a point where the very vitals and heart of our Government, the Treasury of the United States, can be reached through Chesapeake Bay. Apparently you have fortified every other place and left the most vital strategic point of access to your Treasury and your Capital unfortified, and you are still maintaining a fort down there that these men represent to you to be worthless. Now, I should like to know from the chairman of the committee, if Fort Oglethorpe is to be designated as one of the concentration points, what are the transportation facilities there, because transportation of supplies enters so largely into the proposition?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Will the gentleman permit me to answer?

Mr. HAY. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Moon] went fully into that this morning.

Mr. HELM. I am sorry that I did not hear it.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Fort Oglethorpe is some 8 or 10 miles away from Chattanooga. There are eight railroads and a river to the city of Chattanooga. Troops can be sent in any and every direction throughout the United States by rail from Chattanooga. There is a railroad that runs through the park to the edge of the fort, that goes down to Atlanta, and there is also an electric car line from the city of Chattanooga out to the fort. The fort now has an electric plant and a water plant and all the facilities of a first-class fort. It is also suggested to me by the gentleman from Georgia that there is a belt line connecting all of these roads within 3 miles.

Mr. AUSTIN. Is not Chattanooga the greatest railway center in the South?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. We think so. I do not know just whether it is or not. We think it is pretty nearly so.

Mr. HELM. From that it would seem that Fort Oglethorpe is well equipped on the question of transportation. The only remaining question, as I see it, is whether to proceed in the manner that this act would lead you into, and if it is to be determined finally that you are to abandon these posts and concentrate the troops whether this would disconcert a well-thought-out and well-considered plan. I am not prepared to say. I am somewhat inclined to think that if the entire proposition could progress as a project perhaps it would be better.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I want to say to the gentleman from Kentucky, if he will permit me for a moment, that this is a part of the project of general concentration; but before the idea of concentration was thought of the War Department and the then Secretary of War, now President of the United States, recognized the necessity of the establishment of a Cavalry post at this particular place. This recommendation has been made heretofore regardless of this plan, but you will find from the letter of the Secretary of War that the reason is set forth for it as strongly as it is possible for language to make it. And I will say to the gentleman that if a plan of concentration covering the whole country is to be carried out, there can be no objection to the beginning of that plan by the establishment of a brigade post at a point which, regardless of the plans before they were thought out, was determined by the War Department to be, for economic and strategic reasons, the best place in the whole Southeast.

Mr. HELM. Can the gentleman give the committee any information as to what posts the department proposes to eliminate if this project is carried into effect?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I can not because I do not know what the plan of the department is, but I want to say this: That when the troops, or a portion of the troops, which it is likely, are brought back from the Philippines, these posts and every other post in the United States in operation will be needed. But I am not speaking by authority on that question.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, as I stated before, in so far as this particular bill seems to carry out the plan which should prevail and which looks like common sense, I am inclined to support the bill.

Mr. MURRAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HELM. With pleasure.

Mr. MURRAY. The gentleman from Kentucky is the chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department. I would like to inquire of him if he can give the House any information regarding the expenditures of the War Department in the Philippine Islands. The purpose of my inquiry is that I to-day received a letter from a former Member of the House of Representatives, a distinguished representative of the district that I now represent, in which he suggests that it would be an act of constructive statesmanship to have an act passed by Congress requiring the total expenditures by the War Department segregated and charged to a distinct account. I have written to the Hon. Joseph A. Conry about that, and he has indicated to me that there is a great deal of difficulty in determining from a reading of the expenditures in the War Department just what the Philippine expenditures may be. May I ask the gentleman from Kentucky if he can give the House any information upon that matter?

Mr. HELM. The Committee on Expenditures in the War Department have had some testimony before it as to the expenditures in the Philippines, but I am unable at present to put my hand on it. I think I could state with reasonable accuracy that the extra cost of maintaining the Army in the Philippine Islands since the treaty of Paris—and by extra cost I mean the additional pay that the enlisted men get, the 20 per cent, and the additional pay that the officers receive, transportation to and from, and some other elements of cost—amounts to $167,486,403; that is, the extra cost of maintaining the troops in the Philippines over what it would cost if they had been in the United States. This sum, given to the committee by Gen. Wood, is bound to be, as admitted by Gen. Wood, far from accurate and manifestly many times too small, because no one can estimate how many more men have been maintained in toto because of the fact that we have been in possession of the islands than would have been the case without them.

Mr. MURRAY. Were those figures brought out in the testimony before the committee of which the gentleman is chairman?

Mr. HELM. Yes. I will not vouch for the absolute accuracy of my statement; but I will make it correct in the Record.

Mr. MURRAY. May I ask also that the gentleman include in his statement a reference to the hearings where those facts and figures are found?

Mr. HELM. I will do so with pleasure—page 197 of hearing before Committee on Expenditures in the War Department. Now, Mr. Chairman, I was about to conclude my remarks with the statement that if this particular proposition did not disconcert or interfere with any plan that has been put forward by the War Department to carry into effect the policy of concentration, it is a step in the right direction.

The fact that you are abandoning property that cost the Government $25,000,000 is no more argument against the proposition than it would be against that of a man in business that he ought to keep on against a losing proposition. The testimony before the committee was that it has cost over $2,000,000 within the last five years for the upkeep and repairs of these Army posts, so that you can see the result within a few years if you abandon them, or that if you continue the expense of $2,000,000 every five years to keep up these posts, you are still not saving any money. As long as you have them they are a barrier, an absolute prohibition against an organized Army as such. It would be the part of wisdom on our part to get rid of the 41 Army posts, as recommended by the Secretary of War.

I undertook to show you that the proceeds of the sale of large bodies of land that surrounded these posts could be utilized in the construction of enlarged quarters. You do not have to give immediate possession, but retain possession until the proceeds are realized, with which larger quarters can be constructed, and it looks to me as if that might be an element of consideration here. If this proposition is to be put on foot, it might have been well to have sold some of the land, disposed of some of these posts, and with the proceeds of that sale use it in this proposition. But, on the whole, I believe that it is a reasonable and safe proposition, and for myself I feel somewhat inclined to support the bill.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I would like very much to have some understanding about concluding this debate. It has taken a wide range and has not been confined wholly to the bill.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman willing to concede 45 minutes to this side?

Mr. HAY. If we can reach an understanding to have 45 minutes on a side, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from South Dakota and the other half by myself, why I am willing to agree to that.

Mr. MANN. All right.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent—I do not know that this can be done in committee—

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; it can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that general debate may be confined to 45 minutes on a side, one half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN] and the other half by myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that general debate be confined to 45 minutes on a side, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN] and the remaining 45 minutes by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, when the Army appropriation bill was under consideration at this session, upon an amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] limiting the expenditures for barracks and quarters and repairs in such manner as to preclude any portion of the fund being used for the repair of some 25 modern Army posts in different parts of the country, I made a brief discussion of the question then and now involved. There are two phases of this problem. One is purely a question of military policy; the other is the question of economy or financial management. Personally I am satisfied that the new proposition which involves an abandonment practically of four-fifths of the present Army posts of the country, upon which there has been expended somewhere in the neighborhood of fifty to seventy-five million dollars in the past decade, is not only a faulty policy from a financial standpoint, but, so far as I, a layman, a private citizen, am able to judge, is also a very questionable policy from the standpoint of military management. There have been and are now two distinct ideas advocated by prominent men in the War Department upon this subject. The idea of one class of Army men and officers is represented by our present military system in this country, and the idea of others, a majority of the present General Staff, is represented by the policy which would practically abandon the old system and, whereas we have some 49 Army posts at present, to construct 3 along the Atlantic seaboard, 3 along the Pacific coast, and 2 in the intermediate country, making 8 great posts in all, in which should be concentrated all of our standing Army—the Cavalry, the Infantry, and Field Artillery—all under one great field post.

I want to make simply one observation upon this general conflict of policy. It seems to me that the policy now advocated is based upon the theory that the Army in time of peace should be constantly not only in readiness for war, but at the point supposed to be most likely of attack from a foreign enemy, and that the policy that has been pursued under the direction and advice of the War Department is a policy better calculated to care for our standing Army in time of peace. In other words, one is a war policy and the other is a peace policy. As a matter of experience we have had no invasion from a hostile foe for a century. As a matter of probability we will have none for another century. We have some use for our standing Army in time of peace, chiefly in the Philippine Islands, where we keep a number of regiments of Cavalry, and we have had a little use for a portion of our Army for moral or political or public effect along the Mexican border recently. We will have some use for our Army down in Panama for the protection of that zone, but so far as we can look into the future and so far as we can judge of the future from the past there is absolutely no likelihood of an invasion of this country on the Atlantic seacoast or the Pacific seacoast. Why should we abandon the present system of our military establishment for over 100 years of peace upon the theory that this country is liable to foreign invasion and that we have to keep our Cavalry, our Infantry, and our Field Artillery all together and ready for an anticipated conflict. It is a piece of foolishness. Other considerations of greater importance ought to determine where we will have our Army posts and what we will do with our standing Army in time of peace. As a principle I am against the idea of concentration. There is no body of men of less service in time of peace than a concentrated standing Army, particularly in a republic. The new policy, as has been so well said by the gentleman from Wyoming, is, historically speaking, the military idea of monarchical Europe. There they have contending nations side by side, liable to spring at each other's throats at any time.

They are in readiness for war, and they must have their posts along the frontier. Here in our peaceful Republic all conditions are changed. We might have no standing Army, absolutely none. We are not liable to an invasion either from the Atlantic or the Pacific coast, or from our friendly neighbor to the north, Canada, between which country and this we scarcely take the trouble to mark the boundary line. This modern idea of aping monarchical continental Europe in the management of the standing Army of the American Republic in time of peace is as a fundamental policy, in my judgment, altogether wrong. [Applause.] I am never able to work myself up to any excitement over the annual declarations of war of our good friend from Alabama [Mr. Hobson]. I have no fear of a Japanese or any other invasion. The speed with which the troops of any foreign country may ever again land upon American soil will be redoubled by the alacrity with which they will escape after they have taken stock of their surroundings.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. TILSON. Following out the gentleman's argument, would it not be better to entirely disband the Army and get rid of the expense?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. My candid opinion is that if we had not taken upon our shoulders the problems in connection with the Spanish-American War and taken over the Philippine Islands and assisting those people to a point where they can take care of the problems of civilization for themselves, we could have gone right back to the small standing Army that we had before the Philippine trouble with entire safety and propriety.

Mr. TILSON. Having assumed those burdens and obligations, then what?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Having assumed those burdens and obligations, we had better take care of our standing Army in the posts we now have, with our real problem in view. What is that problem? We send a number of regiments of Cavalry every year over to the Philippine Islands. They live in that tropical country in a climate to which they are not accustomed. They last in active service from one to three years, and are brought back in large numbers every spring. What have we been doing with those regiments, mounts and men, when they return from that tropical climate, many of them having acquired diseases incident to the life of a white man in that oriental country? We have been sending them out into the vigorous altitudes of the intermountain west, where, upon the recommendation of the War Department for the last 10 years, we have built the most modern barracks for the men and the most modern stables for the accommodation of the horses, and in the course of a year those troops are well recuperated. We had better continue just what we have been doing. That is the only war problem that we have, namely, the sending of American boys and American horses into tropical countries and the bringing of them back and the taking of their place by others while we are recuperating again our Cavalry force for other service abroad.

What is here proposed? I want the members of the committee to consider the absurdity. First, we have a bill which, if concurred in by the Senate, will reduce the Cavalry of our standing Army from 15 regiments to 10 regiments. In other words, we are abandoning one-third of the Cavalry of our Army if we follow the lead of the Democratic Committee on Military Affairs. This House has already acted. What will follow? We have now, practically, accommodations for our Cavalry at modern, well-built Cavalry posts, in some of the most healthful parts of the country. Here it is proposed, after abandoning one-third of our Cavalry or preparing for the disintegration of it, to build accommodations for 2 more Cavalry regiments down in Oglethorpe, Ga. The policy not only lacks any financial economy or any business management or recommendation, but it tears to tatters any pretense of either a systematic idea or general policy of economy in the management of our standing Army. Has anyone upon the floor of this House undertaken to give this committee a reason why, in the face of abandoning or preparing for the abandonment or disintegration of one-third of our Cavalry troops, having already more good modern quarters than necessary to house the balance, we should proceed to build a brigade post down in Fort Oglethorpe, Ga., to house 2 full regiments of Cavalry in addition to what there is by the way of accommodations there now? It can not be justified and no one has undertaken to justify it. Has any reason been given here to the effect that that point will be any better as a place to take care of these boys who come back with debilitated health from service in the Tropics than the posts in the intermountain region, with an altitude of 3,500 feet, or thereabouts, above the sea?

No sufficient reason or argument can be given to justify any action of that sort. I undertake to say that, from the standpoint of the average layman on military affairs, the best use of a standing army in time of peace is to have it distributed as far as possible in different parts of the Republic to form a nucleus—notwithstanding the attack of the gentleman from Kentucky on that word—for the rallying together of the militia or the National Guard of the States in the effort to make with each individual citizen just as good a preparation for the war which never comes under our peace policies as could possibly be had; and the idea of concentration will not only be more expensive, because it involves the abandonment of something over $50,000,000 worth of property, but to my mind it is absolutely a poorer policy in time of peace, even if it did not incur the additional expense.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Dakota yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. HOBSON. Just merely to state to the gentleman that a bill is pending in the Committee on Naval Affairs upon the whole question or policy of national defense, and I believe before the session is done the chances are that there will be available a council of national defense that can pass properly upon such a question as this without prejudice to any side.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. That leads me to remember something that I might otherwise have forgotten. This Committee on Military Affairs has appointed a subcommittee from the membership of that committee to confer with the War Department in an effort to work out a general plan under which this new idea of monarchical militarism can be carried on in this country. It is considering the matter with the War Department now and has made absolutely no report, and yet before those deliberations are concluded we are asked here by that committee in one bill and another—and I will refer to some more of them in a moment—to indorse this and that and the other project, without any limitations upon them whatever, authorizing the Secretary of War to make a brigade post down at this point, with no limitation on the amount of money to be expended, no limitation on the number of buildings or barracks or officers' quarters to be erected, and absolutely no limitation upon the matter in any respect. And that, I say, is done in the face of the fact that the Committee on Military Affairs has appointed a subcommittee to work out, in connection with the War Department, a general constructive plan to be followed in case Congress should conclude to adopt this newly imported idea from Europe, which Congress has not yet adopted.

Now, I want to remind the committee that although for years the War Department has been proceeding along another line, which I think altogether a better policy, and although this new idea so recently put forth has not been passed upon by either House of Congress, much less ripened into law, the House has been asked to proceed to indorse numerous projects.

We can perhaps judge something of the desirability of this proposed system when put into legislative practice by reminding ourselves of how far we have gone along this line thus far and to inquire how well we like the policy in so far as we have proceeded in it. In the first place, I have already reminded the committee that under the Democratic leadership we have had attached to the Army appropriation bill a limitation upon appropriations which makes it impossible for the War Department to protect and preserve any of these great new Army posts until we may be able to make some disposition of them, if we ever do.

If that bill should pass and be enacted into law as it went from the House, it would make it impossible to make the simplest repairs. A hydrant bursts in the cold weather, and there is no fund provided from which it can be repaired. A roof blows off or springs a leak over a bin of corn or of oats or of hay. The damage by water may run into thousands of dollars. But this Committee on Military Affairs has asked the House to follow its leadership in a restriction which would make it impossible to put a new roof on the building or repair the old roof. In other words, it is a policy of waste and reckless neglect of public property.

Now, while we have been thus careless and thus unmindful of the Government's property, what have we been doing in other ways to encourage new expenditures? It has been argued in the report of the Secretary of War that the land and the buildings of the present Army posts should be sold, and that out of the proceeds we should build new ones.

We have not as yet directed the sale of any; but one of the first things that was done by this House under the recommendation of the Military Affairs Committee was to convey to the State of Texas a portion of the lands at Fort Clark, Tex. In the cross-examination of the sponsors for that measure upon the floor of the House it was not easy to ascertain the value of that property, but from such questions as were answered upon the floor it seemed to me reasonable to suppose it was worth in the neighborhood of $250,000. There is a sum of money that might have been applied to the construction of new posts, if that was the policy; but it will be found, just as that precedent indicates, that comparatively little will be realized by the Government out of these old properties.

Following up the bill giving a portion of Fort Clark to the State of Texas there comes from this same committee an authorization to the War Department to investigate and make report upon the advisability of taking over some 5,000 acres, if I remember correctly, of lands down in the State of Alabama for maneuver purposes, and that bill has passed the House. There is pending upon the calendar from this committee, doubtless to be urged shortly, after this bill is out of the way, if the Military Affairs Committee does not lose its standing upon Calendar Wednesday, another proposition of some interest, House joint resolution 118, authorizing the Secretary of War to accept the title to approximately 5,000 acres of land in the vicinity of Tullahoma, in the State of Tennessee, which certain citizens have offered to donate to the United States for the purpose of establishing a maneuver camp and for the maneuvering of troops, establishing and maintaining camps of instruction, for rifle and artillery ranges, and for mobilization and assembling of troops from the group of States composed of Kentucky, Tennessee, Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, Florida, North Carolina, and South Carolina. Here, before the Congress has even adopted a change of policy, we are asked to adopt new propositions looking to the establishment of large new military enterprises in the districts or States of the men interested.

Something has been said in the newspapers against various Army posts in the Northwest, upon the theory that they were political posts. What do we mean by political posts? I suppose we mean posts designated by politicians or by public men in legislation. I have looked through the list of Army posts in the Northwest, and I find that comparatively few, indeed, have been established by legislative act. The only post near the locality where I live was established back in 1878 by the Secretary of War himself as a military necessity. At no time has Congress had anything to do with it, except at such time as the War Department has sent in its estimates for new buildings or for the support or maintenance of posts. Yet here we are starting out, under Democratic leadership, with a swift, unconsidered method of establishing Army posts and maneuvering points practically all through the South. Texas, Alabama, and Tennessee are heard from thus far, and Georgia is now before the House.

Political posts, indeed! I suppose if, in the revolution of the political wheel, the Republicans should be in the majority next time, if the example of our Democratic friends is to be followed, we would have a like number of bills reported out of the Military Committee creating similar establishments in the Northern or Western States. And if by another revolution the country should conclude that that sort of uneconomic management is poor, whether it emanates from one or the other of the great parties, and our friend, VICTOR BERGER, and his Socialist cohorts should come into control next time, we would have maneuvering grounds in Milwaukee and other great municipal centers. I want to say that you are forcing this question of Army management into politics and into sectionalism. Certainly, if we are to embark upon an entirely new system we ought to do it with decency and with deliberation and upon the recommendation of some proper board which may present the entire plan and designate the places where these great new posts should be established.

Just a word as to the defects in this particular bill before I take my seat. They have already been called to the attention of the committee by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. It is nearly 12 years since I first became a Member of this House. I do not recall at any time a bill passing this Congress and becoming a law that was drawn with the same looseness and recklessness in the expenditure of public money with which this bill has been prepared.

The Secretary of War is authorized to convert a regimental Army post at Fort Oglethorpe into a brigade post. He is simply authorized to make this transformation. What does that mean? It means increasing a regimental post by the addition of barracks and officers' quarters, all of the various improvements necessary to make it competent and prepared for caring for three regiments instead of one.

There has been expended now $1,400,000 on the post, and it would indeed be a confiding Representative who would be willing to hazard a guess that less than $1,000,000 for each additional regiment, making $2,000,000 in all under that general authorization, will be expended in the conversion of that post from a one-regiment to a three-regiment post.

The Secretary, in section 2 of the bill, at his discretion, may locate and construct the buildings necessary for use of the troops of the brigade at any point in Chattanooga and Chickamauga National Park, whether the same is contiguous to Fort Oglethorpe or not.

How do you suppose the Government money would be likely to be expended in a broad authorization of that kind? In section 1 he is authorized to increase the capacity from a regimental to a brigade post, and in section 2 he does not need to expend all of the money at Fort Oglethorpe, but he may put it anywhere in that national park of six or seven thousand acres in extent. If the War Department, in advance of adopting this general policy, is to begin to apportion out its supposed benefits to localities, let us, in the name of consistency and good legislation, define what buildings are to be constructed and place upon them a limitation of cost. Let us not take away our legislative authority and transmit it to any men or single individual, however great or prudent or however much confidence we may have in their business sagacity or the good purpose of the present Secretary of War. We all know that administrative officers, in the very nature of things, are not permanent as to tenure of office.

How have the posts in the Northwest been built, one after another? Invariably by an estimate coming for the construction of the particular barracks to cost so much, a riding hall to cost so much, or improvement of roads within certain limitations, item by item, specifying as to the amount that can be expended. Under this authorization we say to the Secretary of War: "You have a free hand; go down there and make a post that will take care of three regiments of Cavalry; house the men and officers and mounts; build these buildings, just as you please—of stone, of brick, or granite, or what not—expend upon them as much as you see fit; you are not limited as to any particular part of the work or as to the aggregate amount. You are held accountable to no one except to bring out the result."

I may be wrong, Mr. Chairman, but I very much doubt whether this House of Representatives has as yet reached the point, even under the leadership of the present Committee on Military Affairs, where we are willing to legislate in this reckless and inconsiderate manner. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, there is one thing that attracts me in listening to this debate. Gentlemen speak about the great expenditure for the Army, but do not take into consideration that most of this money is spent at home; that it is not money wasted or thrown away, and that in the present system of Army posts scattered throughout the country, the money is probably more evenly distributed than it could possibly be if you had a centralized Army-post system, where a few great Army contractors would get together and handle these Army supplies. I think that is worth taking into consideration when we contemplate cutting down the Army posts and concentrating the troops at a few points for the sake of economy. Now, I have no objection to this bill if properly drawn. I have no objection to their having the post advanced to a brigade post in the South that is now only a regimental post, nor have I any objection to cutting down or doing away with some of the Army posts that are not needed, but I think in this wholesale reduction of Army posts, there is very little wisdom being shown. A great many of those posts have not been built more than from 5 to 10 years, many of them for even a less time. They are on the great transcontinental railroads. We have one in my State that has three transcontinental railroads and, in addition to that, a railroad leading up to the Canadian border and another that will lead to the Mexican border, giving those facilities of transportation from that post. I have reference to Fort George Wright. A gentleman speaking awhile ago in reference to these Army posts said they were where the winds would blow and the soldiers would go crazy, and all that. I want to say that the most of the Army posts in the West, when it comes to location, are ideally located for health and for the comfort of the men. Fort George Wright is located close to the city of Spokane, a city of 125,000 people, and I venture to say that anybody who has ever seen it will not dispute my assertion when I say it is a city almost alone in its class—that there is not one out of a thousand of its size which can compare with it either at home or abroad. It is 10 hours railroad from Puget Sound, the greatest harbor that we have got in the United States, and I think the greatest harbor in the world. There is no reason in the world for the abandonment of that Army post, because some Army officer whose wisdom is perhaps not any better than that of some other man, has conceived the idea of the concentration of troops. You get a great number of troops together and you will have these maneuvers to make this Army the good fighting machine, as the gentleman from Kentucky spoke about awhile ago. You get this great Army together and you will then only have these general maneuvers maybe once or twice a year. They will only get the practice very slowly and they must learn the rudiments of their work in small bodies just the same as they are drilled now in small Army posts.

Mr. Chairman, I believe in economy, but I believe that when we get to the policy of concentrating our troops at a few points near the largest cities that we are moving a step in a radically wrong direction. I am against such a policy.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, my colleague was called from the Chamber and asked me if I would control the time on this side; and, unless there is some gentleman on this side who desires to speak, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED].

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, how much time has the gentleman taken?

The CHAIRMAN. The 10 minutes will complete the time on the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. HAY. I would like to yield to some gentleman over here if it will not inconvenience the gentleman.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Go ahead.

Mr. HAY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP].

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this bill is to incorporate, as I understand it, the recommendations of the War Department for the reduction of the number of posts in this country in order to economize in the expenditure of money for the support of the Army—

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CULLOP. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman explain to the committee how the building of this brigade post will lead to an economy or the reduction of the number of troops in the country?

Mr. CULLOP. That is the very purpose for which I intended to speak, and will do so before I am through.

Mr. MONDELL. It will be interesting to hear it.

Mr. CULLOP. It is to begin the plan, as I have said, of preparing for a concentration of the Army of the country, and I find that this plan has been recommended by the present President of the United States when he was Secretary of War, and every Secretary of War since 1905, and the plan is recommended by them all down to this time, and the reason that the War Department says that it has not been consummated up to this time is the reason urged by the last gentleman who spoke on that side of the Chamber. It is for the purpose of keeping and maintaining the post in his district and, as he said, it was a more equitable distribution of the public moneys throughout the country. So that if you are to take that argument and reduce it to the last analysis the argument would mean a large expenditure of money irrespective of the good that would be derived, because it would furnish to the individual Member the maintenance of some public institution in his district. Now, let us see what has been the result of this system, which largely began its growth at the close of the Spanish-American War. It had a new impetus then. Up to the time of the breaking out of the Spanish-American War we had a standing Army of 25,000 men, including the officers, that cost the people of this country to maintain about $23,000,000.

To-day we have a standing Army of about 94,000 men, and it is costing this Government over $110,000,000 annually with which to maintain it. Is the country deriving the amount of benefit from that expenditure that it should? I think every gentleman on this floor will at once say that it is not. Posts are maintained in this country to-day for the purpose simply of distributing the public revenue in expenditures for purchases that are made for supplies in the cities around these posts. They have been established and kept up largely as the "stalking-horse" upon which gentlemen's political interests may ride to success. And if a Congress is to expend the people's money, that which is raised from the people by taxation, for the purpose of keeping some man in office, it is not meeting the requirements for which this Government was established. What is the result? The cost of keeping up these posts is constantly being added to the expenditure of the country by the distribution of the Army so that they may be occupied, without any good result either to the drilling of the Army to make it more perfect for use or for the benefit of the citizens of this country.

If concentrated, as the proposed plan would necessarily do, the expense of maintenance would be reduced per capita and the efficiency would naturally be enhanced. Means of transportation of both men and supplies are so abundant, radiating to every section of the country, as would enable a reduction of cost in both and would furnish the basis for reducing the original cost in the purchase of all supplies. The same business rules apply to this matter that apply to other business propositions. Concentration of business projects are made in other matters in order to lessen operating expenses. Such rules apply here with as much pertinence as in other business pursuits. There is no difference in their application. If you oppose this policy, my Republican friends, you are opposing the recommendation of every Republican Secretary of War since 1905. The present Chief Executive, when Secretary of War, recommended the policy, and the present Secretary of War recommends it. The officers of the Army recommend it. The policy is a wise one and will eliminate much of the extravagance now existing in the maintenance of the Army and which calls for attention from Congress, because the country demands retrenchment in this particular, and we should respond to that demand. The cost of our standing Army has been growing annually at an alarming rate, without a corresponding efficiency and without a corresponding benefit to the public welfare. This policy will, as the officials show, increase efficiency and reduce the cost. Is not that a controlling feature, one sufficient to command support for it? To my mind it is amply adequate to justify our action and vote for its adoption.

Local conditions too often control the action of Members against policies beneficial to the whole country. Such influences should be subordinated where public weal is at stake.

Public benefits are the desirable objects to be attained in public service, and all other considerations should be waived. The wishes of the public, the citizen whose fealty to his country's welfare inspires his support or opposition to a measure, is worthy of attention in the adoption or rejection of a measure and should not be ignored. The public approves the policy proposed on this subject. It is a wise policy and inaugurated for the benefit of the Army, the public service, and the public good, and personal considerations of Members to preserve the posts in their districts should not secure its defeat or militate against the establishment of this or any other measure which will curtail extravagance. That it will be of such benefit there can be no doubt as a business proposition, and good business methods approve it. The cost of maintenance can be under such a policy largely reduced below what it now is. It is well worth consideration to investigate the growth in the cost of this department and ascertain its cause. Those charged with its management attribute much of it to be in the matter which this policy proposes to remedy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I would like before beginning to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. OLMSTED. Before beginning, I desire to yield two minutes to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. PRAY].

Mr. PRAY. Mr. Chairman, I had no intention at first of making any remarks on the subject of this bill, but in listening to this very interesting debate it occurred to me that I should like to address myself to one or two phases of this important question relating to the Army which is now under consideration. The first is this: It appears from the discussion by gentlemen of the committee that it is very desirable to have places in the United States suitable for the recuperation of troops who have been on campaign in the Tropics. Some reference was made by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] during the course of his remarks to an Army post located in my State. He referred to Fort Assinniboine. Now, in order to throw some additional light on this question this afternoon I want to tell you about Fort Assinniboine. This post was built some 25 years ago of stone and brick, and is said to have cost nearly $2,000,000. It is situated in the northern part of my State, on the Canadian frontier, within 50 miles of the Canadian line. The reservation consisted of 343 square miles. It was one of the most magnificent reservations in the entire country, with a splendid climate, a location consisting of mountains, plain, and valley, suitable for all kinds of maneuvers of every branch of the Army—of Artillery, of Infantry, and of Cavalry. Why, only a few years ago $386,000 were expended in repairs on this post. Here it was that the Twelfth Regiment of Cavalry got its training for two or three years previous to the outbreak of the Spanish-American War.

The officers and men of this regiment were as fine specimens of physical manhood as could be found in the Army. That they gave a most excellent account of themselves on San Juan Hill is a matter of history. My recollection is that out of 22 officers of that regiment 11 were either killed or wounded. There never was a better place in the country for the recuperation of troops coming from the Tropics than Assinniboine, and the same thing may be said of Forts Harrison, Missoula, and Keogh. The latter post, with a reservation of 57,000 acres, has been turned into a remount station. Fort Assinniboine was abandoned last November while I was en route to Washington, and now it appears that Forts Missoula and Harrison, with 23 other posts throughout the North and Northwest, have been selected for abandonment. According to the Secretary of War in his report for 1911 these Army posts have cost nearly $100,000,000. And now it is proposed to abandon them in the interests of economy. If I really thought that this movement would result in economy or any substantial saving of money in the maintenance of the military establishment, it would be a different proposition altogether. But what appears to be the situation in this regard at present?

A few days ago a resolution passed which is intended to result in the purchase of maneuver grounds in the State of Alabama, and to-day we have a bill before us for the establishment of a brigade post in Georgia at a probable cost of five hundred thousand to seven hundred thousand dollars. Why this great expenditure of money for maneuver grounds and Army posts when the Army is abundantly provided for in this respect in all sections of the country? In the limited time at my command I shall not be able to say all that I should like to say in opposition to this alleged scheme of economy. But the ground has been thoroughly covered by others, and I shall not attempt to do more at this time than to record my protest against what appears to be the plan of the majority to abandon these splendid Army posts and reservations now owned by the Government in order that other reservations may be purchased and other posts established in other sections of the country.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, this bill proposes to convert the regimental Army post at Fort Oglethorpe, Ga., into a brigade post. In its original form it proposed an appropriation of $700,000 for the enlargement of that post. The committee recommends the striking out of that provision, because it says:

The necessary buildings can be provided for from current annual appropriations.

But the second section of the bill confers unlimited authority for the construction of buildings at any point in the Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Park, whether contiguous to Fort Oglethorpe or not, and with no limitation whatever upon the expense.

Now, with the merits or demerits of this particular proposition I have very little knowledge, and therefore shall not speak upon that subject. But I agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] that it is unwise and not in the interest of economy to be appropriating for Army posts here and Army posts there and everywhere, without having in mind any definite plan.

There was a definite plan looked forward to and provided for to a certain extent a few years ago, when in pursuance of an act of Congress there was appointed a commission, of which, I remember, Gen. Nelson A. Miles was a member. I think he was the head of it. It was a commission composed of able and experienced Army officers, including some of the most distinguished Army engineers. They investigated the whole subject matter. They traversed the country from the pine forests that used to exist in the State of Maine down to the Everglades—about which we hear so much—in Florida, and from the Atlantic coast to the Pacific coast. They reported at great length and in great detail upon every place that was suggested as an eligible place for an Army post or camp. They finally recommended the establishment of four camps in different parts of the country. One was at Mount Gretna, in my district, and there certainly is no more desirable point in the United States.

It is a place that is used from time to time for the encampments of the National Guard of Pennsylvania, an organization numbering nearly 10,000 men. It is a place that has been used by the United States troops for target practice and for other purposes. It was used as a concentration camp during the War with Spain. It has not only a desirable climate most of the year, as this Fort Oglethorpe is stated to have, but it has such a climate all the year that troops can be drilled there without the slightest inconvenience from undue heat in summer or undue cold in winter. It has the advantage of being splendidly watered with the purest water imaginable and well drained. It has the advantage of two railroad systems. It is not far from the Chautauqua encampment; it is not far from the camp-meeting grounds, so that the private soldier may have the advantage of religious and literary instruction and entertainment. The officers, if they must needs have city life, as we have been told, may run down the road a few miles to the beautiful city of Lebanon, or they may go down the other way to the beautiful city of Lancaster; or, better still, they may come up to Harrisburg and attend the opera and visit our magnificent State capitol, the handsomest and finest State capitol in the United States.

Mr. BOOHER. May I ask the gentleman how much it cost?

Mr. OLMSTED. I would say to the gentleman that it is the cheapest public building in the United States in proportion to its size and its furnishings and its quality.

Mr. BOOHER. Does the gentleman mean in proportion to what it actually cost?

Mr. OLMSTED. It cost very much less proportionately than any similar State capitol in the Union at all comparable in size or quality.

Now, I am not recommending Mount Gretna because I think it may help me to be reelected, because I am not a candidate. I have made two records—at least one—since I have been in this House. Since I entered the service in this House I have taken a wife and have had five children born to me. [Applause.] That is one record; and possibly I made another one when, last December, having no opposition whatever in my district, I announced to my constituents my irrevocable determination not to be a candidate to succeed myself. So that I am speaking now in the interest of the United States, in the interest of the Army, and in the interest of economy in recommending that the Committee on Military Affairs, of which my friend from Virginia [Mr. HAY] is chairman, will hunt up that elaborate report that was made a few years ago, which certainly cost the Government of the United States at least $5,000 to print and which will be found a most important and useful volume of information in great detail, touching all the points which have been considered as to military encampments or sites for brigade posts. If they will examine that and make inquiry and then make a report to this House according to its recommendations, I am sure the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] and his colleagues will have the support of the entire House, and I know they will be doing a good thing for the Army if the other three posts are at all comparable to that proposed at Mount Gretna. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. OLMSTED. With pleasure.

Mr. MONDELL. I understand that the gentleman stated that he had announced to his constituents that he would not accept another nomination. Do I understand that he announced that "under no circumstances" would he accept another nomination, and that his announcement "had reference to the substance rather than the form"? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have time in which to answer the question.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much indeed to hear that the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] has declined to be a candidate for reelection. I do not know of any gentleman in this House who has rendered more valuable service during his term than the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania. [Applause.] I should hope that there might be a string tied to it, but as he does not resemble others whom I might mention, I expect when he says a thing he means it. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, about this bill, from which there has been a very great departure since we started this morning, I want to answer as briefly as I can the objections made to it.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] opposes the bill because he says no estimate has been made of how much money is to be spent at this post. The gentleman from New York knows, or ought to know, that no estimates are made for any post which has already been established by the War Department, in the sense in which the gentleman calls for estimates. He knows, or he ought to know, that when an appropriation is made for barracks and quarters, the Quartermaster General allots to the various posts throughout the country a certain amount of money to be spent at each one of those posts, and the gentleman knows, or he ought to know, that it is not proposed by the War Department or anybody else to take all of the money that is appropriated for barracks and quarters and spend it on this post. I do not think there is anything whatever in the gentleman's objection. The War Department, as a matter of fact, could of its own motion, without any authorization whatsoever from Congress, spend money enough to build this post up to be a brigade post, if it wanted to do it; but the Secretary of War and this administration prefer to come to Congress to get authorization for the purpose of showing their good faith in carrying out the scheme for the concentration of troops in posts which they believe will make for economy and for strategic advantage. I see no reason why this House should not approve and indorse this course. Of course I understand the reasons actuating my friend from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], and the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN], and the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], and my genial friend from Montana [Mr. PRAY]. It has been recommended by the War Department that all the posts in the State of Wyoming be abandoned.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I know the gentleman wants to be accurate, and he generally is very accurate. I think he is not entirely accurate in his last statement.

Mr. HAY. Well, then, I will say three posts in Wyoming. I did not know there were more than three posts in that State.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not recall any recommendation of the War Department for the abandonment of Fort D. A. Russell.

Mr. HAY. I will read what the War Department says:

The following posts should be abandoned as soon as suitable provision can be made elsewhere for their garrisons.

That applies to Fort Yellowstone and Fort Mackenzie.

The following posts are not located with a view of securing economy of administration and supply or a full measure of military effectiveness. Their garrisons should not be increased, and should ultimately be withdrawn to such concentration centers as Congress may authorize.

That applies to Fort D. A. Russell, and if that does not mean abandonment when we finally get the troops into these concentration centers I do not know what it does mean.

I say I understand the motives which actuate these gentlemen, and I am very sorry that they saw fit to take this occasion to make an attack on this bill, simply because the War Department has recommended the abandonment of posts in their States.

This bill will make for economy; it will make for effectiveness; it will make for efficiency; and there is no reason that I have heard adduced by any one of the gentlemen who have spoken why the House should not approve this bill. If it does not make for economy, for effectiveness, or for efficiency, I would be very glad to be informed why it does not.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I assume that the gentleman did not do me the courtesy of listening to my remarks. I endeavored to point out why the expenditure of $5,000,000 for a new Army post and the abandonment of $20,000,000 to $25,000,000 worth of military property was not in the interest of economy.

Mr. HAY. I heard almost every word the gentleman said, and when he said that it would take $5,000,000 to build this post up the gentleman stated that of which he could not have been advised, because $1,000,000, or very near it, has already been spent, and it certainly will not take $5,000,000 more to make it into a brigade post.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman explain in his time how it makes for efficiency and economy to abandon brigade posts in the center of the country for which nothing can be obtained and spend the money necessary to build other brigade posts?

Mr. HAY. If the gentleman wants me to, I will be glad to show the gentleman how it will make for economy to abandon Fort D. A. Russell and build a brigade post at Chattanooga, notwithstanding $5,000,000 has been spent at Fort D. A. Russell. You have a post where there is a climate in which Cavalry and Infantry can not be drilled during almost seven months in the year. You have a post that when the Army was mobilized it took 11 days to get the troops from Fort D. A. Russell to the Texas border.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman does not mean that there are seven months in the year when troops can not be maneuvered at Fort D. A. Russell?

Mr. HAY. They can be maneuvered when the thermometer is below zero, but they are not. The gentleman knows that the climate of that country is not suitable for the maneuver of troops in the winter months.

Mr. MONDELL. Has the Army of the United States reached that point that it can not stand zero weather?

Mr. HAY. Oh, the gentleman always begs the question. The gentleman stated that we are adopting a policy of economy which has abandoned $25,000,000 worth of property. We are not doing anything of the sort. We do not propose to abandon that property until we get property elsewhere for the purpose of sheltering these troops. The gentleman said that you could not under the policy adopted here on this side of the House mend a water faucet if it got out of order in a northwest fort. The gentleman when he made that statement did not know what he was talking about. There is not a thing in the bill which limits the department from making any necessary repairs to any one of the forts recommended to be abandoned in the report of the Secretary of War.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, it is possible that you could mend a faucet, but you could not put in a bathtub.

Mr. HAY. You could put in any repairs that are necessary. The only thing that the amendment to the Army bill provided was that there should not be spent any money for permanent improvements at those posts which the department says ought to be abandoned.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Oh, yes.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I have examined the bill again, and I find the only limitation against permanent improvements seems to be in the one regarding the water system. There is absolutely no authorization, as I read it, as to barracks.

Mr. HAY. If my friend understands disbursements under the bill, he would understand that under the item of "regular supplies" are the items of repair. Under "Barracks and quarters" they make some repairs, but the most of it is done for permanent improvement.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. I notice under the item the gentleman refers to "repairing public buildings at military posts."

Mr. HAY. Barracks and quarters item.

Mr. MANN. Yes. Is not that the item under which they make repairs?

Mr. HAY. Yes, some; and they make some under the head of "Regular supplies." The object and purpose of the amendment was to not spend any money upon these posts for permanent improvement where they had been recommended to be abandoned.

Mr. MONDELL. Then my statement was substantially correct.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman's statement was not correct.

Mr. MONDELL. That you could not mend a leak in the roof or repair a water faucet.

Mr. HAY. That is not correct; nor was it ever intended that there should be anything of that sort in the bill; nor do I imagine that the War Department will follow out any policy of that sort. The gentleman knows very well that it is much more economical to abandon a post which has cost the country a great many thousands of dollars and to put the money somewhere where it will not cost as much to maintain when it is established than to keep up the posts which do cost that much and which do not occupy a strategic position. It is not economical, and it will inevitably cost the Government more than it ought to cost.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. What information has the gentleman on which he bases his assumption that you can maintain a brigade post any cheaper in Georgia than you can maintain a brigade post in Kansas or Wyoming?

Mr. HAY. Well, we are not talking about Kansas.

Mr. MONDELL. One of the posts referred to in the report of the Secretary of War as a post that might ultimately be abandoned is a great Army post in the State of Kansas.

Mr. HAY. Fort Riley.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman imagine that it costs less to keep buildings in repair and to feed men in Georgia than in Kansas?

Mr. HAY. Well, I do not know about that, and that is not the point in this case.

Mr. MONDELL. That is the gentleman's argument.

Mr. HAY. No; I am answering the gentleman's argument that we are trying to take troops from the Northwest, and the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN] undertook to make a sectional matter of it. In so far as I am concerned, there is nothing sectional about it, and there can not be. This bill was introduced without any purpose of interfering with posts in the Northwest.

If those posts have been interfered with, if they are proposed to be abandoned, it has been done by the Secretary of War and not by this side of the House. We are not undertaking to make this a sectional question, and far be it from me ever under any circumstances to make the Army or the posts where the Army is sheltered a sectional question. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. HAY. Oh, yes.

Mr. MONDELL. With regard to the gentleman from Virginia, I feel those are his sentiments, but it is a curious fact that although the Secretary of War has proposed some seven centers of concentration, the two resolutions and this bill which have been brought to the attention of the House contemplate new posts in Alabama, Tennessee, and Georgia.

Mr. HAY. Well, as a matter of fact, they only provide for one post and two maneuvering grounds.

Mr. MONDELL. There is nothing sectional except that fact.

Mr. HAY. I will state to the gentleman, if it is true, it is because it is recommended by the Secretary of War.

Mr. MONDELL. And the Secretary has recommended these other concentration points?

Mr. HAY. No; this bill was sent to the Secretary of War, as all other bills are when they are requested by any Member of this House who introduces a bill. It was sent there. If any other bills have been introduced for that purpose, I do not know it, I have not heard of it. No bill has been introduced for Fort Leavenworth, no bill has been introduced for any other post except this bill, and this bill was sent to the War Department, as the gentleman very well knows is the case with all bills before the Committee on Military Affairs, for report, and it came back with this report.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. I will.

Mr. MANN. Do I understand that this is an invitation to the gentlemen in whose districts these posts are to introduce bills?

Mr. HAY. If they choose to introduce them, I am sure they will be accorded the same treatment and given the same consideration as this or any other bill. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt of that, and I have no doubt they will be introduced.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take up any further time of the committee. I hope that this bill will be agreed to, because I believe it is in the interest of economy, and it carries out the policy which is now being entered upon. It is the beginning of this concentration policy, and I think it ought to be adopted. I yield a half minute to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LEE].

Mr. LEE of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I asked the privilege of extending my remarks on the bill which has been read—"A bill authorizing the Secretary of War to convert the regimental Army post at Fort Oglethorpe into a brigade post"—which was introduced by the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Moon] and myself. It provides for the establishment of a brigade post of three regiments of Cavalry at Fort Oglethorpe, located in Catoosa and Walker Counties, in the State of Georgia. Fort Oglethorpe, now a regimental Cavalry post, equipped with an up-to-date lighting plant, a splendid system of waterworks, and with everything else that contributes to the convenience and comfort of the troops stationed there, is located in Chickamauga National Park, an imperial domain of about 7,000 acres. The Government also owns 1,000 acres for rifle range, a short march from Fort Oglethorpe, so that the Government is the owner altogether of something like 8,000 acres in that immediate locality.

In the debate on this bill so much has been advanced to commend the proposed legislation to favorable consideration that I need not trespass unduly upon the patience and time of this House in urging it to passage. It has the indorsement of the former Secretary of War, now President of the United States; of the present Secretary of War; of Gen. Duvall; of the Army Board; and unanimously of the Committee on Military Affairs. So far, therefore, as official commendation is concerned, I can well afford to let the proposition take care of itself, especially as it is in the line of a general policy looking to the concentration of the Army in a comparatively small number of centrally located posts instead of having it scattered, as it now is, all over the country.

A board was named in 1906 for the purpose of investigating the desirability of locating a brigade post and maneuvering grounds at or near Chickamauga Park. From the report, dated Atlanta, Ga., January 9, 1907, I submit the following extract:

The board is of the opinion that the portion of this tract adjoining Fort Oglethorpe is well suited for expansion into a brigade post, with the necessary ground for close-order drills, ceremonies, and elementary instruction in extended order. The present garrison of Fort Oglethorpe has the use of Chickamauga Park for drill purposes, and it is recommended that authority be obtained to continue its use for this purpose. The board states the remaining portion of the tract to be admirably suited for maneuver purposes. It would be difficult to find a region lending itself so well to these objects, lying, as it does, in a temperate climate, where the winters are usually short and mild. The varied extents of its terrain afford opportunities for exercises in every kind of military operation, while the water supply is more than ample in quantity and excellent in quality.

The board is of the opinion that the tract shown is both suitable and adaptable for the purposes of a brigade post and maneuver site and recommends that it be acquired.

EDWARD T. DONNELLY,
First Lieutenant, Artillery Corps, Aid de Camp, Recorder.

A good deal has been said in the course of this debate as to salubrity of certain Army posts in the great Northwest and in Pacific Coast States. Far be it from me to say aught in detracting of that magnificent climate; but, Mr. Chairman, for all-year-round comfort there is in all this broad land no place that can surpass, if it can equal, that where the Cavalry brigade post is proposed to be located. A more equable climate can not be found anywhere. I will not say that "eternal summer reigns in magic splendor there" all the year round, because there may be sometimes atmospheric conditions that cause the mercury to fluctuate a few degrees up or down. I do assert, however, and I fear no contradiction, that there are no extreme variations of temperature, and that our soldiers could live a comfortable outdoor life from January to December, with interruptions but few and far between. Secretary of War Stimson extols these "climatic conditions which permit troops training almost the entire year." Neither the men nor the horses would have to stagnate in quarters and stables for weeks and months because of inclement weather. They can be kept in activity, their physical powers maintained and developed by proper exercise, their health kept at the very highest possible standard of excellence. That, Mr. Chairman, is not only a moral, but a most important economic consideration.

I submit a letter written by Hon. H. L. Stimson, Secretary of War, addressed to the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 5, 1912.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
House of Representatives.

SIR: Referring to the bill presented by Representative Moon January 5, 1912, and the bill of same wording presented by Representative LEN January 8, 1912, for the purpose of converting the post at Fort Oglethorpe into a brigade post, I have the honor to report that this department recommends favorable consideration of this measure.

The large extent of land of the Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Military Park made available by the terms of the bill, the climatic conditions which permit troops training almost the entire year, the strategic advantage of that point, the economic consideration involved by thus concentrating troops, all make the enactment of said project highly advantageous to the Government. Fort Oglethorpe is the site decided upon by the department as the most suitable and available location in the southeastern section of the United States for a Cavalry brigade post.

Very respectfully,

H. L. STIMSON,
Secretary of War.

In 1898 an investigation of Chickamauga Park was made, and I submit a report of Lieut. Nicholas Senn, Assistant Surgeon General, made at that time:

Chickamauga Park is admirably adapted for a large camp. It embraces several square miles. The forest trees furnish protection against the burning rays of the semitropical sun, and the many open places and fields are utilized as drill grounds. Humus is scanty, and the subsoil is of clay. The surface is somewhat undulating and is cut up here and there by ravines, which add much to the beauty of the scenery. An ample supply of pure water is obtained from numerous wells from 50 to 65 feet in depth, recently supplemented by a pumping station, which derives water from the river a short distance below Crawfish Spring and distributes the water to different parts of the park through iron pipes. The vastness of the grounds is realized by the visitor as soon as he reaches Camp George H. Thomas, which at present is occupied by nearly 50,000 men, yet seldom more than one regiment can be seen at one and the same time.

Gen. H. V. Boynton, chairman of the Chickamauga National Park Commission, made the following report in 1898:

It is a well-known fact in this section that Catoosa and Walker Counties, in which the park is situated, are among the healthiest in the United States. In the seven years that the park force has been at work here not a single member of it, either officer or employee, has died from disease. There has not been a single case of typhoid fever among them or the 2,000 laborers employed in that time. In the last census year there was not in the whole of Catoosa County (and this is the county in which the present much-criticized forest camps are situated) a single death from typhoid fever and only three from malarial fever.

Holding the above views, I respectfully ask that this communication may be placed in the files, and that if the major general commanding agrees with me that it would be fair to do so, an attested copy may be furnished the press for publication.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. V. BOYNTON,
Chairman Park Commission.

Could any locality be found more suitable for such maneuvers as cavalry should undertake? The park is ideal for both mounted and dismounted practice, and the near-by rifle range furnishes opportunity for the soldier boys to perfect themselves in "shooting straight." Transportation facilities are more than ample, for nine trunk lines of railway run within a few miles of the park, while one touches its very boundaries. Provisions for man and beast are plentiful in the country around and can be procured at reasonable prices. A God-fearing, morally clean community abounds in all that section, and what that means in the case of a large body of troops every commander can tell you. When nature formed that spot she forgot nothing that might contribute to the health and comfort of man—fertile soil, pure atmosphere, and the best of water. There is a spring right at the park than which even famous Ponce de Leon is no greater. Crawfish Spring may almost be called an inland basin, with a daily flow of 40,000,000 gallons of water. There are many other famous springs in that locality—Yates Spring, capacity 10,000,000 gallons daily; Martins Spring, capacity 9,000,000 gallons daily; Leet Spring, capacity 5,000,000 gallons daily; Poplar Spring, capacity 2,000,000 gallons daily; Pond Spring, capacity 6,000,000 gallons daily—all a short distance from Fort Oglethorpe. Their cool, limpid waters are indeed a joy forever. What place can be named, Mr. Chairman, in all our beautiful land more beautiful than this and that could be more ideally adapted to the purpose of being made the abiding place of a great body of troops.

There is still another consideration of commanding importance, and that is the historical greatness of the place. I know very well that this alone could not, and should not, determine the selection of a modern Army post, but with such a combination of physical advantages as I have pointed out it well deserves to be called to mind. Chickamauga Park is hallowed ground. All over its expanse the Blue and the Gray grappled in titanic conflict for the cause which each held sacred and right. Every foot of the soil has been wet with the lifeblood of heroes. Near here was fought "the battle in the clouds," on Lookout Mountain, and the bloody Battle of Missionary Ridge. Deeds of daring and valor were done there that will thrill the souls of generations yet unborn. What inspiration more profound, more abiding, to a soldier than in such surroundings? What incentive more powerful than this to duty, patriotism, and sacrifice?

In the discussion of this proposition the question of dollars and cents has been elaborately put into the foreground, and I shall but briefly touch that feature. We have been told that $1,000,000 has already been spent at Fort Oglethorpe, and that the enlargement of the post to proportions adequate to the accommodation of a brigade of Cavalry will call for the expenditure of probably $4,000,000 more. Mr. Chairman, I am proud of my membership in a party that is pledged to economy in every department of the Government, and I would not wantonly support or indorse any scheme that falls short of an accurately measured standard of public housekeeping. By early training and by the habits of a lifetime I am accustomed to "guard the dime to gain the dollar," and this principle of private life I have always endeavored to apply in the discharge of public duty. Mere local considerations would not move me to give voice or vote to any enterprise, no matter how alluring, which would lack the essential of usefulness.

In this instance, however, my mind is clear as to the great advantages to the Government from the proposed change. From the Canadian border to the Gulf, and from the Atlantic Ocean to the Pacific, Army posts are scattered over the wide expanse of our country. Poor, indeed, the State that does not contain one or more of them. They have cost the Government hundreds of millions of dollars for construction and maintenance. In many instances their location was determined, not by the judgment of officers of the Army, but by political pressure. In the years gone by some of them have served a useful purpose as bases of protection against marauders of one kind or another. But conditions have changed, and these straggling outposts are no longer needed. As population increases and becomes more and more concentrated; as regions, once sparsely settled, teem with dwellers, police protection by the Army is required in ever-decreasing measure. Nothing, then, more reasonable than that the War Department should seek to further the larger purposes to which every branch of the Military Establishment should be applied.

The plan for the centralization of troops, of which the proposition embodied in this bill forms a part, is not only in the direction of economy, but also of the readier movement of large army units. In this plan is embraced the question of transportation facilities no less than that of the saving caused by providing maintenance for thousands at one point instead of hundreds in widely separated localities. The argument that an Army post may be a few hundred miles nearer a given point loses its force when it appears that transportation from that post to that point is more difficult of accomplishment than from a post more distant perhaps, but within immediate reach of ample means to transport large bodies of troops without delay.

All essential requirements are met in the case under consideration. Central location, nearness, and amplexness of transportation facilities, salubrious climate combine to make Fort Oglethorpe an ideal place for a great Army post, and I earnestly hope that this bill will be passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to convert the regimental Army post at Fort Oglethorpe, Ga., into a brigade post, and that for the purpose of the enlargement of the same to accommodate and quarter a brigade of troops there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $700,000, or so much as may be necessary for this purpose.

Mr. HAY. I will call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the committee has recommended an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, line 5, by striking out all in the line after the word "post" and all of the remainder of the section.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the amendment for the purpose of asking a question. The gentleman from Virginia stated in his closing remarks that this bill, in his opinion, ought to be supported, because it was in the direction of economy. What I ask of the gentleman is, have there been any facts brought before the committee tending to show that a brigade of Cavalry can be maintained any more cheaply at Fort Oglethorpe, Ga., than at our present Cavalry posts?

Mr. HAY. I will state to the gentleman that at some posts where there is now Cavalry, for instance, at Fort Apache, in Arizona, I believe we have two troops of Cavalry, a post about 60 miles from a railroad, it is very easy to perceive it will be very much cheaper to put those two troops of Cavalry at Fort Oglethorpe than to keep them where they are.

There are also other Cavalry posts, or places where they have some Cavalry, and it would be very much cheaper to abandon those posts and put that Cavalry at Fort Oglethorpe. But I want to say to the gentleman that the mere fact of the maintenance or the sustenance of Cavalry is not the only thing that enters into the economy. Transportation is a very important and a very large item. Take, for example, the transportation of recruits. Three or four hundred recruits are transported to these various posts at one time. If you have a post like Chattanooga, for example, where it is on a line of railway and easily accessible to the centers where troops are largely recruited, it costs much less to transport them there than to a post out in South Dakota, or in Wyoming, or in Washington.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Of course, it depends entirely on where you start the troops from.

Mr. HAY. That is true.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. And there has been no effort made, so far as I have seen, to show the probable place of starting of troops is any nearer Oglethorpe, Ga., than Wyoming?

Mr. HAY. I will say to the gentleman that the three largest recruiting posts in this country are New York, Chicago, and Columbus Barracks. They get more recruits from those depots than from any other points in the United States.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Of course, the transportation of the troops is a small part of the maintenance of the Cavalry arm of the Government.

Mr. HAY. It is a very large expense.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. There are the supplies for men and for horses. The particular post in Arizona to which the gentleman refers is a small one.

Mr. HAY. That is true. I happened to think of that one.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. You are proposing now to cut down five regiments, or one-third of the entire remaining Cavalry. I know from observation that there are some of these Cavalry posts in the best agricultural sections, where forage for horses and general supplies for men, the large items of maintenance, can be supplied in competition with Fort Oglethorpe or any other part of the United States.

Mr. HAY. That may be. But I do not understand the gentleman maintains it is any cheaper at those posts than it is at Oglethorpe?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Exactly as cheap and perhaps cheaper.

Mr. HAY. I have tried to show the gentleman that there were other economies entering into the location of these posts other than the purchase of supplies or the mere purchase of what the cavalryman may have to eat.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. That is one item.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN] has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

When the Army bill was under discussion the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] moved an amendment, which was carried, reducing the Cavalry Arm by 5 regiments. If that should become a law we should have only 10 regiments of Cavalry. If the bill now before us should become a law and the post be enlarged as proposed it would house 3 of the 10 regiments of Cavalry in the United States Army. In other words, the proposition puts nearly a third of the Cavalry regiments of the Army at one post. The gentleman discusses the matter from the standpoint of economy. I think it can scarcely be successfully demonstrated that Cavalry can be maintained in northern Georgia or Tennessee more cheaply than it can be maintained in Kansas or in Wyoming. The gentleman seems to be particularly disposed to criticize the maintenance of Army posts in Wyoming.

Mr. HAY. No; I am not. The gentleman seemed disposed to criticize me and I simply criticized him.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman speaks of the added cost of transportation. Most of the mounts of the Cavalry regiments of the country come from the Mississippi Valley and the Plains and Mountain States. All of these Cavalry horses will have to be transported from 1,000 to 1,500 miles in order to reach this great Cavalry post, whereas the Cavalry posts now built and utilized are in the localities from which Cavalry horses are drawn, and therefore, instead of it being in the interest of economy to establish a great Cavalry post down in the region proposed, it would very largely increase the cost of the maintenance of Cavalry.

The fact is that there is no argument at all for this bill unless we need additional Army posts, and that we do not require additional posts is proven by the fact that the War Department now is considering the advisability of abandoning some of the posts we already have. So that the proposition before the House, as I attempted to state it a little while ago, is to abandon first-class, up-to-date Army posts, recently constructed in the North and Northwest, and to spend the people's money uselessly in the building of new Army posts elsewhere.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the head of the Army and the Secretary of War have made recommendations to reverse what has been the policy of the country heretofore in reference to Army posts, recommendations designed to do away with the smaller posts and to concentrate the Army in larger posts. While I am not at all sure that the recommendations of the present Secretary and the present Chief of Staff may not be reversed by the succeeding Secretary and the succeeding Chief of Staff, I would be inclined to follow the recommendation of the Secretary of War in reference to this bill if it were not for one thing. The letter of the Secretary of War is dated the 5th of February, the 5th of this month. At that time the Army appropriation bill was practically prepared, if not reported. There was no item in that bill, as reported, cutting down the Cavalry by one-third, and it is to be presumed that the Secretary of War, in making his report upon this bill, contemplated a brigade post at this point, upon the basis of 15 regiments of Cavalry, where he might be willing to recommend that one-fifth of the Cavalry be concentrated at this military park. But in so far as I am aware, we have no expression of opinion from the Secretary of War as to whether one-third of the Cavalry in all the United States shall be concentrated at this one post. It is quite a different thing to put 3 regiments of Cavalry out of 15 at Fort Oglethorpe from what it is to put 3 regiments of Cavalry out of 10 at this post.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman think there will be just 10?

Mr. MANN. Well, I do not know just how many there will be, but certainly it is the part of wisdom not to act upon the assumption that the House will not maintain its prerogatives in reference to appropriations, and it is not to be assumed now for the purposes of legislation that the proposition which the House agreed to will not be in the law when it is passed.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. No; I do not assume that.

Mr. MANN. It would be easy and wise to wait until the appropriation bill is disposed of and we know whether there will be 10 or 15 regiments of Cavalry before we legislate upon either proposition.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Let me ask the gentleman a question. Does not the gentleman think it safer to leave the question of the distribution of Army posts to the discretion of the Secretary of War rather than that Congress should go into details of administration of that character?

Mr. MANN. I do. I fully agree with the gentleman in reference to that. But I do not think it wise for Congress to legislate in providing a new post upon the assumption that the action which was recently taken is to be stricken down or overridden at the other end of the Capitol, and we have no report from the Secretary of War as to what he would recommend, based upon only 10 regiments of Cavalry in the United States.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. If it is to be left to the discretion of the Secretary of War, where the gentleman concedes it ought to be left finally, is it not the wise course to leave it there now regardless of the action of the Senate?

Mr. MANN. No. On the contrary, the Secretary of War feels bound, and ought to feel bound, by the action of Congress in legislating, and if we legislate to provide a brigade post at this place it is the duty of the Secretary of War to carry out the expressed wish of Congress. The gentleman has already stated that the Secretary of War now has the authority to do this, and the purpose of this legislation is to guide that authority which he now exercises. If that is the case, we ought to wait until we know what we are to legislate upon. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] on behalf of the committee.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War, in his discretion, may locate and construct buildings necessary for the use and accommodation of the troops of the brigade at any point in the Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Military Park, whether the same be contiguous to Fort Oglethorpe or not, said buildings to be used for the accommodation of part of the brigade to be located at Fort Oglethorpe.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment presented by the gentleman from New York will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to section 2 the following:

"Provided, That for the fiscal year 1914 and thereafter the Secretary of War shall submit to Congress, for its approval, detailed estimates of any buildings and improvements to be made at said post before proceeding further to the construction thereof."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that in the authorization of these brigade posts Congress should have detailed information as to the scheme proposed by the department, and should approve some plan for the enlargement of them. This amendment is so drawn that if this bill shall become a law, it will not interfere with the department in its work during the coming fiscal year. Thereafter detailed estimates are to be submitted, and then the committee having jurisdiction of this matter can specifically approve and make its recommendations, and Congress will have some control over the enlargement of the post. I believe it to be wise legislation to keep that control in the hands of Congress.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York; first, because the department submits detailed information as to how they spend each appropriation and where they propose to spend it, and, secondly, because Congress would have a right, by a limitation on the appropriation bill, to confine the appropriation to a particular sum at any post.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the amendments to the House with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CURLEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 17029) authorizing the Secretary of War to convert the regimental Army post at Fort Oglethorpe into a brigade post, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments and with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question being taken, the Speaker declared the bill passed.

Mr. MONDELL. I make the point of no quorum present.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that the point of no quorum comes too late.

The SPEAKER. The announcement had been made that the bill was passed, and the Chair thinks the suggestion comes too late.

Mr. MANN. The Chair usually announces that the bill is passed, but in this case the Chair did not make the usual announcement.

The SPEAKER. If the Chair did not announce that the bill was passed, then the gentleman's point of order is in time.

Mr. MANN. The Chair announced that the bill was passed, but the Chair did not make the preliminary announcement which the Chair usually makes, that "The ayes seem to have it." The point of order was made in proper time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair likes to be fair and to give every man a chance, and while he does not remember whether he said "The ayes seem to have it" or not, the point of order is made that there is no quorum present, and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] moves a call of the House.

Mr. MANN. It comes automatically, does it not?

The SPEAKER. That is true. The call of the House orders itself automatically.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, what has become of my point of order against the claim of the gentleman from Wyoming that there is no quorum present? I made the point of order that the Speaker had announced the result and declared that the bill had passed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that usually and properly the proceeding is to announce that the ayes or the noes, as the case may be, seem to have it, and thus give Members an opportunity to make the point before the announcement that the bill is passed. But when everything seems to be going along smoothly and nobody raising opposition sometimes the Chair is pretty quick in announcing these matters and does it before a Member can make himself heard. The Chair remembers that the very same thing occurred with the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], and the Chair gave him a chance to raise the point.

Mr. MANN. The rules provide, Mr. Speaker, that if the Chair announces the result—

The SPEAKER. There is no trouble about it because the Chair recognizes the fact, and the call of the House takes place automatically under the rule.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I want to make the suggestion that it has not officially been determined that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct, although the Chair thinks his eyes are pretty reliable. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and thirty-nine Members present; not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of the passage of the bill will, when their names are called, answer "aye" and those opposed will answer "no."

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 177, nays 40, answered "present" 11, not voting 165, as follows:

LAWRENCE (MASS.) STRIKE.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I have received a communication transmitting resolutions of the common council of the city of Grand Rapids, Mich., bearing upon the Lawrence strike. I send the resolutions to the desk and ask that they may be read for the information of the Senate.

There being no objection, the resolutions were read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Whereas it has come to our notice through the columns of the daily newspapers that the authorities in the city of Lawrence, Mass., where there is now pending a strike of large magnitude, have taken it upon themselves to detain children of the strikers who are about to leave the city, on their way to the homes of friends and sympathizers in other sections of the United States, which friends and sympathizers were to care for the children temporarily, so that the suffering occasioned by the strike troubles in that locality might not reach the children who are innocent of any participation in said trouble: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the common council of the city of Grand Rapids, as city officials and as representatives of the citizens thereof, do hereby protest against the unjust and cruel acts of said officials of said city of Lawrence, Mass., and do decry said acts as inhuman and against all the principles of American citizenship, and as this body believes against the laws of these United States relative to the free enjoyment of liberty by every citizen and every resident within the confines of this country; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of said resolutions be forwarded to the governor of the State of Massachusetts, the mayor of the city of Lawrence, Mass., Congressman EDWIN F. SWEET, Senators TOWNSEND and SMITH.

AFFAIRS IN MEXICO.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, while I do not desire or propose at this time to discuss the situation in Mexico, yet as that matter is being considered, I understand, by the Committee on Foreign Relations, I feel it my duty to present to the Senate a letter, or rather a part of a letter, which I have received from a very intelligent and respected citizen of San Antonio, Tex. I ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

SAN ANTONIO, TEX., February 23, 1912.

Hon. CHAS. A. CULBERSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CULBERSON: I write this to call your attention to the continued use of this city as a place of rendezvous and plotting for numbers of revolutionists in rebellion against the constituted authorities of their own country. This has been the case for many years past, especially in connection with discontented politicians from Mexico, who have so often availed themselves of the security afforded them here to arrange and work up schemes against their home government, this being a direct violation of the neutrality laws, as Mexico is a friendly power. I think it is high time that some adequate measure should be adopted to put an end to such proceedings, which are so extremely disastrous to the commerce of San Antonio, of the State of Texas, and of the United States in general.

I especially call to your attention a clipping inclosed from the local paper, which shows the audacity of these people in their use of our soil as a ground for working up their plots. The thing usually happens in this way: Señor don Such-a-One arrives here full of appeals for sympathy as a much-abused refugee from his country; his life and his family's lives in danger there, and coming here to seek sanctuary in the land of the free, where everybody is safe. This is Act I. Then comes Act II. This peaceful and peaceable gentleman, who declares he has not the slightest idea of promoting a revolution nor any intention of making any active or inactive movement against the home rulers, receives the visits of "a little band of his devoted friends and adherents," and this pacific gentleman, who is here only for peace and safety and a little pleasant recreation, issues a manifesto, stating his infinite reluctance, etc., but really, in view of the immense need which his country has for him, etc., etc., he will consent to accept the Presidency, etc. Act III comes in in another direction, when Americans living in Mexico, many of them at a distance from large towns, in small pueblos, or on haciendas, are forced to flee for their lives, having no police or military protection against rebels or bandits, leaving their property to the mercy of the raiders, and often suffering great danger and hardships on the way and great loss and ruin in their business interests. Then there is the interruption or practical destruction of trade between the two countries; the interruption or disruption of traffic and transportation facilities; and this is not merely for the time, but each occurrence of this sort increases the feeling of hostility toward the United States, for the party in power for the moment will not fail to bear in mind the successful machinations of their opponents, under the protection of our flag, even though they also may have sought and used the same protection not long before. This sort of thing has been done no less than three times within a year, and but for this immunity and the ease with which conspirators can come here and carry on their plottings, under the guaranties of safety they have here, the revolutionary movements in Mexico would not have been as easy to initiate nor as difficult to suppress as they have been with this shield behind their organizers.

I would ask you, then, to take at once some steps to bring about adequate and proper legislation for the purpose of putting a stop to the unmolested presence here of such plotters, who are audacious enough to allege their complete innocence and innocuousness up to the very moment of their starting out in armed rebellion against their home government. The consequences of such disturbances are ruinous to the many Americans having interests in Mexico, besides the damage to our commerce with that country, the expense of military movements entailed by the need of border protection, etc.

Mr. CULBERSON. The name of the writer of this letter is not given by me, but the original letter is subject to the inspection of any Senator who may desire to see it. The newspaper article to which he refers is from the San Antonio Daily Express of the 18th instant, and I ask that it may be inserted in the Record without reading. It contains a manifesto dated and signed at San Antonio, Tex., February 17, 1912, by a man who has been chosen as provisional President of the Republic against the present occupant of that high station.

There being no objection, the article referred to was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

[From San Antonio Express, Feb. 18, 1912.]

GOMEZ ACCEPTS THE PROVISIONAL PRESIDENCY—IN MANIFESTO ISSUED FROM SAN ANTONIO HE SAYS HE HARKS TO CALL FROM MEXICO—WILL NOT CROSS BORDER—HE REITERATES THAT HE WILL STAY IN SAN ANTONIO AND WILL TAKE NO PART IN WARFARE—URGES THAT ALL FOREIGNERS BE RESPECTED.

Emilio Vasquez Gomez, formerly a member of the Mexican cabinet, broke his sternly kept silence last night by issuing a manifesto addressed to the Mexican Nation, in which he says he is willing to become provisional president of the country across the Rio Grande if the people are willing and want him.

Señor Gomez, self-exiled, has told reporters of the Express daily for two or three weeks that he knew no more of what was going on in Mexico than he gathered from the daily papers. He has repeatedly declared he knew no more of the workings of the men and factions opposed to President Madero than did any other man who made a habit of perusing the press.

Immediately after his arrival, however, he said he would like to see conditions in his country bettered, but that he would not engage in the work of leading any such a force as he thought would be necessary to bring about the change he desired.

The proclamation of Mr. Gomez goes further than did his original statement, but nowhere does it contain a suggestion even that its author expects to cross the dividing line between the land of his birth and the one in which he has found refuge during the past few weeks.

Mexican Consul General M. A. Esteva heard of the Gomez proclamation and came to the Express office to see a copy of the document. He communicated with United States Marshal Nolte at once, and, of course, cabled Mexican Minister of Foreign Affairs Manuel Calero the substance of the matter.

ESTEVA IS SURPRISED.

Mr. Esteva regards the proclamation as deeply significant. He expressed much surprise that a man of Gomez's quietness would attach his signature to a manifesto of the kind. "I had come to believe Señor Gomez was entirely harmless," said Mr. Esteva. "We shall pay closer attention to him in future."

"I received good news from my Government to-day," added Mr. Esteva. "I am officially informed the disorders in and about Chihuahua are lessening to a minimum and that better conditions prevail in a number of sections."

Mr. Esteva and Marshal Nolte will have a conference this morning. United States and Mexican secret-service men will at once begin a sharp surveillance of Mr. Gomez and of his residence at 501 South Presa Street. But Marshal Nolte says the proclamation, no matter how significant it may be, can not be construed within itself as an overt act, as something demanding a warrant of arrest on account of the neutrality laws of the United States.

The Gomez proclamation, signed in his own hand and given to the Express, follows, the translation having been made by a capable instructor in Spanish in the San Antonio public schools:

"Manifesto of Hon. Emilio Vasquez Gomez to the nation: In the city of Tacubaya, on the 31st of October of last year, while I was absent from my country, the plan bearing the above name was subscribed by some of my followers calling the Mexican people again to arms to continue the glorious revolution according to the San Luis Potosí plan, because the high ideals proclaimed in the said plan of San Luis Potosí and brought out victorious in the last revolution had been abandoned and even destroyed by the leader of that revolution, Mr. Francisco I. Madero.

"The Tacubaya plan declares void the general elections from the 1st to the 15th of October, 1911, on account of the vice presidential imposition the Houses of Congress of the union are declared dissolved as well as all their acts null from the 15th of September to the 15th of December; it demands that the elections legally effected throughout the States of their respective officers should be held as sacred; and finally proclaims the actual continuation of the revolution according to the Tacubaya plan, which has for its immediate purpose to take me, after the accomplishment of victory, to the presidency of the Republic, endowed with all the necessary powers to convoke to general elections for President and Vice President of the Republic, for Representatives and Senators to Congress of the union, and in order that I should at once begin in that high position to carry out the glorious ideals won by the revolution of November, and in this manner to restore the peace and tranquillity of the country, which had already been altered when the plan of Tacubaya was proclaimed.

"From the last days of September of last year to the present moment I have been and I am still in a foreign land, without taking part in my country's politics, excepting the small correspondence addressed to the press and to some persons in Mexico, advising them as to what should be done to heal the deep wounds and cure the acute pains that my country was and is still bitterly suffering.

"CONDEMNNS MADERO GOVERNMENT.

"The conduct of the government of Francisco I. Madero by abandoning and even destroying the sacred ideals of the revolution has exclusively created and developed in the south, in the north, and even in the center of the Republic formidable revolutionary movements that will shortly do away with the present Government. That armed movement has for its general aim the triumph of the Tacubaya plan and bears also for its general standard my humble name.

"By means of those revolutionary movements the Mexican people, disappointed on account of the conduct of Mr. Madero, is anxiously and patriotically striving to establish as facts and truths in their daily life the ideals of political liberty; of justice in all its manifestations; the establishment of irrigation by the State; the acquisition and division, without injury to anybody, of the extensive tracts of land; to organize numerous legions of small proprietors throughout the country, securing peace and the increasing development of Mexico; and in some regions still go further, and regain for the small towns lands, water, and woods, so that they may in this manner enjoy the life of the honest worker, free from misery and from the sordid and abject condition they have stood for many years.

"In the presence of so far-reaching events, brought forth by intense desire and the firm determination of the Mexican people to sincerely, honorably, and patriotically carry out in triumph and to their complete realization the glorious ideals of the revolution, because they clearly see in them the longed-for conquest of their moral, intellectual, political, and economical aggrandizement, I therefore feel that it is my duty before such events to break silence and declare, as I do solemnly declare, that with heartfelt gratitude and deep conscience of the high duties imposed upon me I shall accept the position as provisional President of the Mexican Republic, and I shall comply, and I do now protest that I shall honorably and patriotically comply with the high duties imposed upon me by the highest charge and by the plan of San Luis Potosí as reformed in Tacubaya.

"I have considered it imperative to formulate the above protest and declaration, because all Mexicans must be always and inexcusably at the service of the fatherland and where the fatherland calls us.

"I appreciate the great responsibility that a citizen assumes when under such difficult and serious circumstances as those about to come decides to take the rudder of state to firmly guide it toward the return of constitutional order and toward peace, toward the realization of the ideals already won and longed for by all, but I have faith, profound faith, in the fact that with a fixed eye persistently riveted upon our supreme laws and upon the revolutionary ideals, the only lighthouses that shine over my path, and with the help of common effort from all and the patriotism and heroic example of our forefathers in similar cases that has inspired the heart of the Mexican people, we shall all united reach the desired port where we shall find salvation and the aggrandizement of that fatherland bequeathed to us by our fathers, and which we protest to deliver to our children integral and always worthy.

"WILL NOT GO TO MEXICO.

"I am residing now and I shall continue to reside in this city, without taking, as I have never taken, part at all in the armed movement now going on in my country, but I take the liberty of recommending, as a simple citizen only, to all my partisans who are now or may be under arms the greatest order possible in all their acts, profound respect and even true protection to the life of a peaceful man, whosoever he may be, either native or foreigner, since in this manner only just, noble, and patriotic causes are conducted, so do national culture, decency, and dignity demand it at all times and under all circumstances.

"I would make a special recommendation in regard to foreigners; they have effectively and powerfully contributed and will continue to contribute their capital and valuable teachings that they bring to us for the elevation of the Mexicans and the progress of the country, and it is necessary that they should have in our honest and worthy conduct a true guaranty and protection of their lives and property, and we must necessarily do it in this manner to justify and give credit to our cause and in order to maintain before all the nations of the earth the culture of our people and the national dignity.

"Everything for the fatherland's sake and for the fatherland.

"EMILIO VASQUEZ.

"SAN ANTONIO, TEX., February 27, 1912."

WOULD REMEDY CONDITIONS.

Señor Gomez said yesterday he would use his influence to bring about a resumption of rail communication between Torreon and C. P. Diaz, Mexico.

"I believe the railroads should be kept in operation," said Señor Gomez. "It is bad for traffic to be stopped and valuable property destroyed in the manner reports indicate. I expect to send a message to some of my friends, as a private citizen, of course, to use their best efforts in abating the molestation of the railroads."

Señor Gomez's decision to take action at once was largely brought about by a letter which he received yesterday from West Livaudais, a prominent exporter of New Orleans. In his letter Mr. Livaudais said:

"In view of the demoralization in Torreon and the Laguna district and the fact that the rebels there have formally declared themselves under your banner, I respectfully beg leave to call your attention to the distressing conditions now prevailing in that territory. Hundreds of women and children have flocked to Torreon from the surrounding country in the last few days only to find all outlet to the north cut off by the rebels, and I am just in receipt of a telegram from Torreon telling me that the conditions border on panic, and that the fear and apprehension among these neutrals is something terrible, and this condition is only intensified by the fact that the rebels refuse to permit the railroad company to repair a few bridges so as to resume communication with C. P. Diaz.

"I have been in Torreon several times during the past 18 months under just such conditions as prevail at present, and am quite convinced that my informant has not exaggerated the facts. With your permission, I would like to suggest that a word from your very good self to the gentlemen in command of these Laguna forces might have the immediate effect of permitting a resumption of rail communication between Torreon and C. P. Diaz, as the railroad officials inform me that they are prepared to repair their bridges just as soon as they are assured of the necessary protection. Such a move on your part will be of much benefit to noncombatants and can not possibly hurt the cause for which you and your friends are struggling.

"Please give this matter your serious consideration, and if it meets with your approval, please have the kindness to act quickly."

Railroad officials in the City of Mexico have informed Mr. Livaudais they are prepared to make repairs just as soon as they are given the necessary protection.

Mr. CULBERSON. In this connection I will ask the Secretary to read section 5286 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read, as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Sec. 5286. Every person who, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, begins, or sets on foot or provides or prepares the means for any military expedition or enterprise, to be carried on from thence against the territory or dominions of any foreign prince or state, or of any colony, district, or people, with whom the United States are at peace, shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and shall be fined not exceeding $3,000 and imprisoned not more than three years.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I ask that the portion of the letter submitted and the newspaper clipping from the San Antonio Express be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that reference will be made.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 4663) to authorize and empower the Secretary of War to locate a right of way for and to grant the same and the right to operate and maintain a line of railroad, telephone, telegraph, and electric transmission lines through Vancouver Barracks and Military Reservation, in the State of Washington, to Washington-Oregon Corporation, its successors and assigns, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 422) thereon.

Mr. HITCHCOCK, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 3917) for the retirement of Henry R. Drake, captain, Philippine Scouts, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 423) thereon.

S. 4685. A bill to correct the naval record of Michael Philbin; and

S. 4227. A bill for the relief of Lieut. Richard Philip McCullough.

Mr. BRYAN, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 1683) for the relief of Baer, Senior & Co.'s successors and C. Ingenohl, submitted an adverse report (No. 424) thereon, which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

HUDSON RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 4978) to supplement and amend the act entitled "An act to incorporate the North River Bridge Co. and to authorize the construction of a bridge and approaches at New York City across the Hudson River, to regulate commerce in and over such bridge between the States of New York and New Jersey, and to establish such bridge a military and post road," approved July 11, 1890, to report it favorably with an amendment, and I submit a report (No. 419) thereon.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill just reported by the Senator from Virginia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, may I inquire if the whole of the bill has been read?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has been read save the amendment proposed by the committee, which the Secretary is about to read.

Mr. ROOT. I reserve the right to object until I hear the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York reserving the right to object, the Secretary will read the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. The committee propose to amend by adding at the end of the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That the location of said bridge and all plans for its construction shall hereafter be submitted to the Secretary of War for his consideration and approval before the construction of said bridge shall be entered upon.

So as to make the bill read:

*Be it enacted, etc., That section 2 of the act entitled "An act to incorporate the North River Bridge Co. and to authorize the construction of a bridge and approaches at New York City across the Hudson River, to regulate commerce in and over such bridge between the States of New York and New Jersey, and to establish such bridge a military and post road," be, and the same is hereby, so supplemented and amended as to extend the time for the completion of the construction of the bridge by the said act authorized until the 1st day of January, in the year of our Lord 1922: *Provided, That the location of said bridge and all plans for its construction shall hereafter be submitted to the Secretary of War for his consideration and approval before the construction of said bridge shall be entered upon.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I wish to ask the junior Senator from New York whether that is deemed to be all that is requisite to enable the authorities of the city of New York to exercise their judgment regarding the location of this bridge? There is a very important and extensive plan for the improvement of the water front, and it would be very unfortunate to have a bridge located in such a way as to interfere with that plan or with any plan that may take its place.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, there were three corporations interested in the proposed project of bridging the Hudson River. This application for the extension of a franchise on behalf of one of the three was at first opposed by the interstate commission representing the States of New Jersey and New York. Before the committee to-day all of those companies, including the interstate commission, approved the proposed amendment. The amendment was suggested by the interstate commission so that it might not be embarrassed in its future plans by a location of the terminal by one of these private enterprises. The bill as amended meets the approval of every person interested.

Mr. ROOT. I have no objection, Mr. President.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PHILADELPHIA & READING COAL & IRON CO., ETC.

Mr. JONES, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 5459) for the relief of the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. and Walston H. Brown, sole surviving partner of the firm of Brown, Howard & Co., reported the following resolution (S. Res. 239), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the bill (S. 5459) entitled "A bill for the relief of the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. and Walston H. Brown, sole surviving partner of the firm of Brown, Howard & Co.," now pending in the Senate, together with all the accompanying papers, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims in pursuance of the provisions of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911; and the said court shall proceed with the same in accordance with the provisions of such act and report to the Senate in accordance therewith.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS.

Mr. BRIGGS, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred the resolution (S. Res. 234) submitted by Mr. SUTHERLAND, on the 26th instant, reported it favorably without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds or any subcommittee thereof is hereby authorized during the Sixty-second Congress to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to employ stenographers from time to time to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject that may be pending before said committee, and to have the testimony and proceedings of such hearings printed for the use of the committee. The expense of such hearings shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and said committee and subcommittee thereof may sit during the sessions of the Senate.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED.

Bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SWANSON:

A bill (S. 5540) for the relief of the trustees of the Zion Methodist Church, of York County, Va. (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. BRIGGS:

A bill (S. 5541) for the relief of John W. Barriger and others; and

A bill (S. 5542) for the relief of Jane A. Oberly (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. HEYBURN:

A bill (S. 5543) for the relief of Fred Larsen; and
A bill (S. 5544) for the relief of Peter W. Anderson; to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BORAH introduced a bill (S. 5545) providing for the issuing of patent to entrymen for homesteads upon reclamation projects, which was read twice by its title.

Mr. BORAH. The bill relates solely to homesteads upon irrigation projects under the Carey Act, and I think it should be referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will be so referred.

By Mr. BORAH:

A bill (S. 5546) to create a commission of industrial relations; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. TOWNSEND. By request, I introduce a bill for the relief of certain officers of the Regular Army who graduated from West Point. I do this, not because I am in sympathy with the general proposition but because it covers the case of men who, under the ruling of the Supreme Court, undoubtedly would be entitled to this longevity pay. For myself, it occurs to me it would be much better for the Congress to consider the rights and the claims of Volunteer officers of the Civil War rather than to pay for services rendered by officers while they were being supported and educated by the Government as students at West Point. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (S. 5547) for the relief of James Butler and others was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CLAPP:

A bill (S. 5548) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to convey a certain tract of land to the Minnesota & Manitoba Railway Co.; to the Committee on Public Lands.

A bill (S. 5550) granting a pension to Emma P. Justison;

A bill (S. 5551) granting a pension to Edward Wilson (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 5552) granting a pension to Martha McCutcheon (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. DILLINGHAM:

A bill (S. 5553) granting an increase of pension to Daniel Fordham (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. MARTIN of Virginia:

A bill (S. 5554) granting a pension to Lucy W. Lockwood; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CHAMBERLAIN:

A bill (S. 5555) granting an increase of pension to Jacob W. Kinsey (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CURTIS:

A bill (S. 5556) to amend "An act to create an auditor of railroad accounts, and for other purposes," approved June 19, 1878, as amended by the acts of March 3, 1881, and March 3, 1903, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

By Mr. PENROSE:

A bill (S. 5557) granting an increase of pension to William T. Saylor; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. GUGGENHEIM:

A bill (S. 5558) granting a pension to Frances A. Cox (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 5559) granting an increase of pension to Michael Geraghty (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 5560) granting an increase of pension to Henry H. Hastings (with accompanying paper);

A bill (S. 5561) granting an increase of pension to Alice L. Horne (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 5562) granting an increase of pension to Joby A. Howland (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 5563) granting an increase of pension to Emma C. Palmer (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 5564) granting an increase of pension to James W. Ruff (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 5565) granting an increase of pension to John D. Thomas (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WORKS:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 81) proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing that the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. CURTIS:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 82) authorizing free or reduced transportation to regular immigration agents while actually engaged in the performance of their work, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

INTRACOASTAL WATERWAYS SURVEY.

Mr. PENROSE. I submit a resolution for the printing of a document, the estimated cost of which will be under $500. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 240) was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed in paper covers, for the use of the Senate, 1,700 copies of House Document No. 391, Sixty-second Congress, second session.

DETAIL OF ARMY OFFICER TO CHILE (S. DOC. NO. 352).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a letter from the Secretary of War, having relation to the request of the Republic of Chile that an officer of the Coast Artillery Corps, United States Army, be permitted to serve as an instructor in the army of that Republic.

I believe that should Congress grant authority for the detail of the officer named by the Secretary of War it would inure greatly to the benefit of the relations existing between Chile and the United States, and I respectfully and strongly urge that Congress take favorable action in the case under the precedents which have been established and which are cited in the letter of the Secretary.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 29, 1912.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

H. R. 9420. An act authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the city of Jackson, Miss., carriage and cannon or field-pieces; and

H. R. 17937. An act authorizing the Secretary of War to pay a cash reward for suggestions submitted by employees of certain establishments of the Ordnance Department for improvement or economy in manufacturing processes or plant.

SENATOR FROM WISCONSIN.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I desire to announce that, with the permission of the Senate, on to-morrow, immediately after the routine morning business, I will submit remarks on the Stephenson case.

AMENDMENT OF PRINTING LAWS.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to announce that on Monday, March 4, following the routine morning business, I shall desire to address the Senate on the bill (S. 4239) to amend, revise, and codify the laws relating to the public printing and binding and the distribution of Government publications.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, a word in connection with the announcement of the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Kansas. I have already a standing notice that I will call up the Stephenson matter and would probably antagonize any other business with that motion. So I would not want Senators to think that by giving notice that they would on a certain time take up matters within the time legitimately appropriated to the consideration of the Stephenson matter, I would waive it.

Mr. BRISTOW. I desire to state to the Senator from Idaho that I announced I would speak on the Stephenson case.

Mr. HEYBURN. I so understood it. I said nothing to the contrary.

Mr. SMOOT. I simply gave notice, and if the Senator from Idaho should then insist upon taking up the Stephenson case, of course I could name another day.

Mr. HEYBURN. I only desire to avoid any suggestion of discourtesy in case I may call it up at that time.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH COLOMBIA.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from yesterday, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 237, submitted yesterday by Mr. HITCHCOCK, requesting the President to transmit to the Senate copies of all correspondence and communications between this Government and the Government of Colombia since the last presentation to the Senate of such correspondence and communications to this date.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, in view of the fact that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] gave notice some time ago that he would speak on the arbitration treaties today, I ask unanimous consent that my resolution may go over until to-morrow or until the next legislative day, without prejudice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, an order to that effect is entered. Morning business is closed.

GENERAL ARBITRATION TREATIES (S. DOC. NO. 353).

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the arbitration treaties with Great Britain and France as in open executive session.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. I offer the resolution of ratification which I send to the desk, the adoption of which at the proper time I shall move. It is the one that has been printed as part of the committee report, but I have made two slight modifications in it, one correcting a typographical omission and the other adding a single word to make it more explicit.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the ratification resolution with the proposed modifications.

The Secretary read as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. LODGE in the nature of a substitute to the resolution of ratification submitted by the Committee on Foreign Relations August 12, 1911, with their report upon the treaty signed by the plenipotentiaries of the United States and Great Britain on August 3, 1911:

"Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of a treaty signed by the plenipotentiaries of the United States and Great Britain on August 3, 1911, extending the scope and obligation of the policy of arbitration adopted in the present arbitration treaty of April 4, 1908, between the two countries, so as to exclude certain exceptions contained in that treaty, and to provide means for the peaceful solution of all questions of difference which it shall be found impossible in future to settle by diplomacy."

"Resolved further, That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty with the understanding, to be made a part of such ratification, that in any joint high commission of inquiry to which shall be referred the question as to whether or not a difference is subject to arbitration under Article I of the treaty, as provided by Article III thereof, the American members of such commission shall be appointed by the President subject to the advice and consent of the Senate, and with the further understanding that the reservation in Article I of the treaty that the special agreement in each case shall be made by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate means the concurrence of the Senate in the full and unrestricted exercise of its constitutional powers in respect to every special agreement whether submitted to the Senate as the result of the report of a joint high commission of inquiry under Article III or otherwise."

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the greatest attribute of sovereignty is the war power, for on that power rests the peace of the country, and the issues of life and death are in its keeping. The maintenance of peace depends upon the ability of the sovereign nation to defend itself against aggression and upon the wise management of its foreign relations. Under our form of government everything relating to peace and war was given by the States to the Government of the United States. The duty of keeping the United States so well prepared that aggression from other nations will not be invited, and if attempted will be repelled, is imposed by the Constitution upon the Congress of the United States and is effected through legislation which must receive the assent of the President. This duty has not been adequately fulfilled at all times in our history, and there is always a tendency to overlook the unquenchable fact that nothing is so essential to a country's peace as a well-settled conviction on the part of the rest of the world that to make successful war upon that country would be a highly dangerous as well as a most unprofitable undertaking. Weakness and wealth combined constitute the greatest incentive to war, for the nation which is at once rich, high-spirited, and unarmed is a constant temptation to great military powers which have not yet ceased to stand armed and ready along the highways of civilization, prepared, if the opportunity seems favorable, to spring out upon and to despoil the unwary and unready traveler. We have a striking illustration of this important fact before our eyes at this very moment. If Turkey had possessed a strong and efficient navy the shores of the Mediterranean would be to-day untroubled by war. The naval weakness of Turkey alone made the Tripolitan War possible.

The second element in the maintenance of peace lies in the conduct of the country's foreign relations, and when the States stripped themselves of this great function of sovereignty they exercised the utmost care in transferring it to the Government of the United States. To the two Houses of Congress they gave the power of declaring war. Upon the President and the Senate they conferred the power to make peace. We can make war without the participation of the Executive; we can make peace without the participation of the House of Representatives; but we can make neither peace nor war without the participation of the Senate. The makers of the Constitution represented the States, and the States wished, so far as possible, to retain control not only of the issues of peace or war, but of the entire conduct of our foreign relations in the body which was to represent them under the new Constitution. The first plan was to give to the Senate the sole power to make treaties and to appoint ambassadors and judges of the Supreme Court, which is of interest as indicating the purpose of the States represented in the Constitutional Convention to keep, so far as possible, in their own hands the absolute control of our foreign relations. The impracticability of this scheme led to the adoption of the arrangement which exists to-day under the Constitution. Our foreign relations are to be conducted by the President and the Senate. The initiative rests with the President, but no action can be taken without the concurrence of the Senate.

I call attention to these familiar facts, because they are too often overlooked by those who seem to think that in dealing with treaties the Senate, if it happens to differ with the Executive, is engaged in a merely selfish struggle for its own prerogatives and is even usurping powers which do not properly belong to it. The most casual examination of our history shows what is too often forgotten, that it was the deliberate purpose of the States, when they made the Constitution and resigned some of their sovereign powers to the General Government, to retain in the body which represented the States an unquestioned authority in our foreign relations and in the last resort a complete control over them. The treaty-making power was not thus arranged as a mere matter of governmental machinery or as a contrivance which would prove convenient in operation, but as embodying a fundamental principle which the States regarded as of the most vital importance. The framers of the Constitution were determined that the relations of the United States with foreign nations should not pass beyond the control of the representatives of the States which had resigned this great power to the care of the General Government. The history of our foreign relations, therefore, is the history of the joint action of the President and the Senate, and in every phase of those relations from the foundation of the Government the Senate has been deeply concerned.

We are now called upon to deal with two treaties designed to secure, under certain limitations, the general arbitration of all differences which may arise between the United States and the two nations with which the treaties are made. Before entering upon an analysis of those treaties it will not be amiss to review briefly the course pursued by the Senate in that portion of our foreign relations which has been concerned with the promotion of the cause of international peace. The necessity of doing so arises from the fact that these treaties have been made the subject of public agitation and organized clamor—methods of managing our foreign relations which I venture to think eminently unsuitable—and because the attitude of the Senate and the questions involved in the treaties have been grossly misrepresented and the real issues clouded and confused. For example, I have had letters from persons, presumably intelligent, asking how it was possible that I could oppose the treaties when I knew that the alternative was war. It was apparently vain to reply that I was not opposed to the treaties; that, on the contrary, I favored them, and that the alternative of the treaties was not war; that our friendship with England and with France rested, fortunately, on much deeper and firmer foundations than any paper promises to arbitrate could create; and that, whether those treaties existed or not, war between the United States and England or the United States and France was inconceivable, if not impossible. In many letters and resolutions it was obvious that the writers of the letters and the framers of the resolutions were entirely unaware that we already had twenty-five general arbitration treaties with as many different countries, and that the two treaties now pending are not new propositions, but are merely intended to be extensions of the terms of those which they will supplant. If we are to have intelligent discussion of the subject, this is a preliminary fact which it is well to keep in mind.

A distinguished member of the New York bar was kind enough to send me not long since a copy of an address which he had delivered upon the subject of these treaties. On the first page I find this sentence:

With France our relations have from the beginning ever been of the closest.

There is no more doubt of the great help given us by France in our Revolution than there is of our lasting gratitude for what she then did. But the statement I have quoted is historically entirely inaccurate. Our relations with France down to 1867 were at times the reverse of close or friendly. At the close of the eighteenth century France was seizing our merchant vessels, and the quarrel growing out of these seizures and out of our acceptance of the Jay treaty was bitter in the extreme. Actual, although not declared, war existed. We retaliated on French merchant ships and privateers. In 1798 we abrogated all the French treaties. There were two frigate actions in which we were victorious, in one instance capturing the French man-of-war, and we raised a provisional army with Washington in command in order to be ready for a French invasion. In Jackson's time our relations with France were strained almost to the breaking point owing to the ill feeling growing out of our unsatisfied claims against France for depredations upon our commerce. During the Civil War no foreign country was so hostile to the United States as France under the Government of the third Napoleon, and it was he who tried, when we were struggling for existence, to destroy the Monroe doctrine and set up an empire, with an Austrian archduke at its head, in Mexico. In the face of these facts to say that "our relations with France from the beginning have ever been of the closest" is of course utterly incorrect, and I instance this case merely in order to show how carelessly and with what imperfect information the discussion of these treaties has been approached during the public agitation of the subject, even by men of ability and legal training. The Senate, which they are so quick to criticize, can not afford to approach and does not deal with treaties in this uninformed way.

Let me take yet another example of the public discussion of these treaties. In a newspaper ordinarily sane and intelligent I have seen it gravely alleged that Senators opposed the treaties—by which it was meant that some Senators thought an amendment necessary—because they feared that the ratification of the treaties would deprive them of military patronage. What this may mean I do not know, for beyond occasionally nominating a cadet or a midshipman I am not aware that Senators have any military patronage, and I hardly think that when these treaties are ratified West Point and Annapolis will thereupon be closed, the buildings razed, and the land sold. If we did that we might end by leaving the dove of peace without a cannon's mouth in which to build its nest, a possibility not to be contemplated with calmness. The same newspaper further said that the resistance to the treaties came from the influence of corporations interested in the manufacture of military supplies. If such corporations—and it is the fashion just now to charge everything to corporations—have labored to oppose these treaties, they have done it with such profound secrecy that no Senator, at least, has been able to detect them at their nefarious work. The only relation sustained by any corporation, which I have been able to discover, to the question of these treaties is that agitation in their behalf has been supported in part, at least, by the profits derived from the manufacture and sale of armor plate.

The fact is that this attribution of improper motives to Senators who venture to think that these treaties might be improved by amendment is a rather sorry business. If Senators feel that these treaties, like all treaties, should be carefully scrutinized and that it would be wise to amend them, they do so from a high sense of the duty imposed upon them by the Constitution, and are well aware that in the performance of this duty they expose themselves to misrepresentation, misconstruction, and much ignorant abuse. The pleasant and easy thing to do would be to disregard their constitutional duty, shut their eyes, jump down into the arena, and shout with the crowd. The primrose path is that marked out by the wisdom of Mr. Pickwick:

"Slumkey forever!" roared the honest and independent.
 "Slumkey forever!" echoed Mr. Pickwick, taking off his hat.
 "Who is Slumkey?" whispered Mr. Tupman.
 "I don't know," whispered Mr. Pickwick in the same tone.
 "Hush, don't ask any questions. It's always best on these occasions to do what the mob do."
 "But suppose there are two mobs?" suggested Mr. Snodgrass.
 "Shout with the largest," replied Mr. Pickwick.
 Volumes could not have said more.

When Senators decline to take this excellent if worldly advice they may be mistaken, but they can by no chance be governed by any motive except the desire to do their duty to their country as they understand that duty. The assumption that excellent but wholly irresponsible persons are more concerned about the preservation of peace than Senators who are charged with the heavy responsibility of peace and war may, I think, be described as unfounded if not unwarranted.

It has also been declared in many letters and resolutions that any attempt to amend the treaties was an evidence of hostility to peace, and that the Senate, which had shown itself dissatisfied with some of the terms of the treaties, was therefore hostile to the promotion of peace on earth. I think, Mr. President, we have had a little too much of this very modern doctrine that a bill or a treaty must not be amended by the Houses of Congress, which possess the right of amendment, and that because Senators think that a treaty can be improved by amendment they should therefore be set down as hostile to its purpose. It is well to remember that perfecting amendments are not yet wholly unknown and that not infrequently amendments have proved in the end to be the best parts of both laws and treaties.

I trust I shall be pardoned for referring to a case in point as to this matter of amendment. When the reciprocity measure was before the Senate the senior Senator from New York and I, who both favored the bill and voted for it, pointed out that by the paper provisions we were laying ourselves open to a great deal of trouble with other nations, who would surely seek to apply the favored-nation clause to the concessions given to Canada on wood pulp and print paper. No heed was given to our warning; the doctrine that amendments were equivalent to enmity was rigidly applied and to-day, as a consequence, we find ourselves involved in a most unpleasant controversy with friendly nations who insist that under the favored-nation clause their wood pulp and print paper must come into the United States free of duty. We must either accept their interpretation and thus bring about in a furtive way a situation which Congress certainly did not intend or we must deny their contention and expose ourselves to the charge of bad faith in not carrying out our treaty agreements and very likely to retaliation because of our attitude in this respect. I mention this circumstance merely to show the great danger of undertaking to uphold the doctrine that amendments to a bill or a treaty are necessarily hostile and that under the pressure of public clamor we must resign the important right of amendment and accept the exact terms of a bill or a treaty which we have had no part in framing or preparing.

Let us now determine by a brief review of the course of the Senate in regard to the policy of arbitration the justice or the injustice of the charge so loosely made of late that the Senate is not friendly to the cause of peace. The concerted and general effort to solve international differences without resort to war is very modern and is one of the developments of our own times in which we may take a just and a profound satisfaction. After the Pax Romana, the widespread peace of the Roman Empire, came to an end—after the great civilization of Rome went down in ruins and when men were left to struggle painfully back toward the light which had been extinguished by the fall of the civilization of Rome and Greece, it may be broadly said that for 1,500 years war never ceased in the western world. Even when truces and armistices had been agreed to, even when formal peace had been made and there was no declared war, private war and reprisals recognized or connived at by governments, went on unchecked; as was the case during centuries, for example, on the Scottish border or on the high seas in the days of Elizabeth. Gradually, as governments strengthened and as feudalism disappeared, private wars came to an end, although reprisals without declared war still lingered on. The suppression of private wars was the first great step of modern civilization toward the establishment of universal peace. The next advance was made by putting an end to systematic reprisals, such as happened between this country and France at the close of the eighteenth century when no war between the two countries was formally declared. The last stage is necessarily that in which we shall so far as possible put an end to declared war between nations, and the first step in this direction is to remove as many questions as possible, which can not be settled by diplomatic negotiations, from the arbitrament of war and submit them to the judgment of an arbitral tribunal.

Let us see what the share of the United States and of the Senate of the United States has been during the last century in the promotion of this great policy. By special clauses in the Jay treaty of 1794 with Great Britain and the Pinckney treaty of 1795 with Spain we recognized the principle of referring to a commission for decision certain questions involving claims then outstanding. The action of the Senate in favor of arbitration thus began with those treaties at the very outset of our history under the Constitution. Since that time we have made with different countries 84 treaties providing for the special or general arbitration of international differences. The Senate has ratified 83 and rejected 1, the treaty of arbitration with England in 1897. I venture to say that no other country has such a record in favor of the arbitration of international disputes as is displayed by this list, which I shall ask permission to print at the end of my speech and as a Senate document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted as requested.

Mr. LODGE. It seems to me that this record is good evidence of the practical services of the Senate of the United States to the cause of peace through arbitration. The list includes the 10 treaties negotiated by Mr. Hay and submitted by President Roosevelt in December, 1904, which the Senate amended by the substitution of the word "treaty" for the word "agreement," and which our own Government declined to submit to the Governments with which they were made on account of the Senate amendment. This long list includes such great arbitrations as the Alabama claims, the Mexican boundary, the Northwestern boundary, the fisheries, and the Alaskan boundary; but this is not all. In 1888 the Senate took up the question of general arbitration before The Hague convention had been thought of and before some of those who now reproach the Senate and describe it as hostile to peace had given any marked attention to the subject. In 1890 the Senate passed the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President be, and is hereby, requested to invite, from time to time as fit occasions may arise, negotiations with any government with which the United States has or may have diplomatic relations, to the end that any differences or disputes arising between the two Governments which can not be adjusted by diplomatic agency may be referred to arbitration and be peaceably adjusted by such means.

To the policy embodied in that resolution the Senate has adhered ever since.

I think, Mr. President, that these facts dispose of the somewhat silly assertion that the Senate is opposed to peace because it seeks to amend a given treaty. There is no branch of the Government, there is no branch of any government, which has done so much to promote the cause of peace by practical action as the Senate of the United States. We have not altered our position. Every Member of the Senate to-day is in favor of promoting peace through arbitration. Every Member of the Senate is in favor of enlarging the scope of arbitration so far as it is practicable. There is not a Senator in this body who does not sympathize in the fullest degree with the purposes of these treaties, and I confess that it wearies me to hear this constant reiteration of the statement that the Senate is taking advantage of technicalities to oppose the policy of peace because, in pursuance of the duty imposed upon it by the Constitution, it is considering whether the terms in which the purposes of these treaties are expressed are wise and safe and judicious. The Senate from the foundation of the Government has almost invariably treated these questions involving our relations with other countries in the spirit in which they should be approached. Party politics, as a rule, have been conspicuously absent from the action of the Senate in regard to our foreign relations. They have been entirely absent since I have been in the Senate, and one reason for the pride and confidence which I feel in the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate is that during my service there of more than 14 years I have never seen the introduction of party politics into a question involving our relations with a foreign nation. We have often been divided upon the questions submitted to us, but never upon party lines, nor, so far as I could judge, for political purposes. We have always adhered to the principle laid down by Webster when he said that his politics "ceased at the water's edge."

The Senate of the United States, therefore, in my opinion, approaches these treaties, as it has approached all others, in the manner and with the spirit hoped for and expected by the great men who framed the Constitution. Knowing as I do the history of the Senate in regard to the promotion of peace by arbitration, knowing as I do its attitude at the present moment, I confess that I resent the attack made upon the Senate by persons who have neither the knowledge nor the responsibility which the Senate possesses and who, although actuated no doubt by an admirable sentiment, do not pause to consider carefully and thoroughly the great issues involved in every treaty of a far-reaching and perpetual character made by the United States with a foreign government.

I desire now to take up the two treaties actually pending before the Senate. These treaties in nowise alter our relations with England and France. With both these great nations if a difference should arise on any subject where arbitration was possible it would be referred to arbitration as a matter of course. As I have already said, there is not the slightest peril of war with either of these nations, and our friendship with them rests on the firmest and strongest grounds. The purpose of these treaties is to serve as an example and in that way to promote the general cause of peace throughout the world by extending the scope of arbitration beyond the limitations agreed to in the treaties now existing. The fact that the great merit of these treaties lies in the hope that they will serve as an example to the rest of the world makes it peculiarly important that their terms should be considered with the utmost care. If we make these treaties with England and France, it must always be borne in mind that we could hardly refuse to make a precisely similar treaty with any other friendly nation with whom our relations and the possibility of the development of future differences might not at all correspond to those which exist with France and England.

The first article of these treaties is the one which enlarges the scope of arbitration as compared with that established by those now existing. It effects this purpose by substituting for the clearly defined limitations of the treaties which are at present the supreme law of the land the general limitation that all differences in which the parties are concerned by virtue of a claim of right made by one against the other and which are justiciable by reason of being susceptible of decision by application of the principles of law or equity shall be submitted to arbitration. In other words, the limitation in these treaties is that questions which are not claims of right and which are not justiciable in accordance with the principles of law and equity shall not be arbitrated. It is therefore of very great importance to make sure that we know, when we come to the adoption of these treaties now pending, exactly what a "claim of right, justiciable according to the principles of law or equity," means. In the determination of this question, however, we are met at once by the fact that no one knows what the vital phrases of the first article actually mean or may be held to mean in this connection, for they have never been the subject of interpretation or even of consideration in the domain of international law.

Let us begin with the words "claim of right." I have heard this phrase referred to in debate as if its meaning and intent were as fixed and well known as those of "tort" or "trespass" or "life estate" or "contingent remainder," to which last Mr. Fearn devoted the celebrated volume reputed to be one of the most profound and most difficult books in the whole range of legal reading. Not being aware of the exact meaning of the words "claim of right," I tried at once to relieve myself of such unpardonable ignorance. I turned first to the most obvious source of knowledge, the dictionary, and I found no such phrase given in Bouvier. Under the word "claim" certain kinds of claims were defined, but there was nothing about a "claim of right." Unenlightened, I turned to the word "right," and there I learned from the first line that a "right" is "a well-founded claim," which seemed to indicate that a "claim of right" was a claim of a well-founded claim, or, more simply, a well-founded claim. The dictionary goes on to define "human rights," "inalienable rights," and "divine right," and then says:

The idea of claim and that the claim must be well founded always constitutes the idea of right.

Further on it is stated that—

As rights precede government, so we find that now rights are acknowledged above governments and their states in the case of international law. International law is founded on rights—that is, well-grounded claims which civilized states, as individuals, make upon one another. As governments come to be more and more clearly established, rights are more clearly acknowledged and protected by the laws, and right comes to mean a claim acknowledged and protected by the law.

From which I should deduce that a "claim of right" is simply a claim acknowledged and protected by law—that is, a legal claim. I searched in vain, however, through a number of textbooks of highest authority in international law for the words "claim of right." That phrase appeared to be unknown to the best writers on the law of nations. I turned back then to the law as it is generally known, and in our Supreme Court Reports I found a definition which seemed to throw some light upon the object of my search. In delivering the opinion of the court in Prigg against Pennsylvania (16 Pet., 539) Mr. Justice Story, eminent both as a judge and as a writer upon law, said (p. 615):

What is a claim? It is, in a just, juridical sense, a demand of some matter as of right made by one person upon another, to do or to forbear to do some act or thing as a matter of duty.

In other words, a claim, to be a claim at all in a "just, juridical sense," must be a claim of right, or, more simply, a legal claim which does not differ in essence or principle from the plain and easily understood words, "differences which may arise of a legal nature," as used in the 25 general arbitration treaties which we now have with 25 different countries. The advantage of the latter phrase is that everyone understands it, while the words "claim of right" are not apparently known as yet in the domain of international law and have still to be interpreted and accepted in that somewhat misty region where law exists without a sanction and is based on customs and traditions many of which are ethically wrong according to modern ideas. I think, therefore, that we may assume that these treaties cover any international difference of a legal nature which is "justiciable" according to the principles of "law or equity." We are, however, entirely in the dark as to the meaning which The Hague court or a special arbitral tribunal or a high commission of inquiry might give to the word "justiciable," and for anyone to declare with an air of finality that it means this or that is merely an expression of the individual opinion of the man who attempts to furnish the definition.

We are equally destitute of any authoritative definition or determination or interpretation as to the significance of the words "law or equity" in this international connection. The Senator from Maryland said that the committee had interpreted the word "equity" wrongly in arguing that the use of that word in these treaties would open the door to questions of every kind. The committee in its report and in what was there said about the words "law and equity" did not intend to suggest that these words of and by themselves opened the door to an unlimited range of questions. All the committee desired to suggest was that "law or equity," like the word "justiciable," in this connection entirely lacked any authoritative definition or interpretation. The report of the committee pointed out correctly, as it seems to me, that the word "equity" had in all English-speaking countries a technical and artificial sense for which other countries, where the English common law and equity do not prevail, afforded no exact parallel. This I believe to be an absolutely accurate statement, both historically and legally. That equitable principles were understood by Roman jurists and find recognition in the modern codes, which are based upon the Roman system, is undoubted, but that is a very different thing from the accepted interpretation of the words "law or equity" as used by English-speaking people. The analogy between our law and equity and the Roman jus civile, jus naturale, and jus gentium is as clear as it is obvious, but the origin and development of these ideas were not at all the same in the Roman and English systems, and have resulted in practice in very different conceptions and definitions. Equity as a system, such as is known to us, is peculiar to those countries which have grown up under the English common law and has no parallel among those other nations which have grown up and developed their institutions under a system of jurisprudence derived from Rome. All this is the merest commonplace, and the sole purpose of the committee in referring to the words "law or equity" was to point out, what I believe to be true, that those words were differently understood in different countries and had never yet found a common interpretation in international law in the connection in which they are used in these treaties.

Therefore the limitation placed by Article I upon arbitrable questions is entirely undefined. No one knows and no one can know how tribunals of the future may construe those words. They may give them a very narrow or a very broad application, but the opinion of anyone beforehand, no matter how eminent he may be, as to what these tribunals in the future will decide must, in the nature of things, be mere speculation. Such being the case, it is obviously of the utmost importance that neither the United States nor Great Britain nor France should put itself in a position where it could not, while rigidly observing the terms of the treaty, decide in the last resort the extent of the limitation imposed upon the field of arbitration by the statement that questions not justiciable are not within that field.

If these treaties, following the example of those now upon the statute books, had stopped with Article I, which enlarges and defines with a new definition the scope of arbitration, there would have been, I think, no question as to their immediate ratification, because under the terms of that article every special agreement—and there can be no arbitration without a special agreement in each case—was to be submitted by the President to the Senate for its advice and consent. No question, therefore, could be arbitrated under that article, if it stood alone, which had not received the approval, first, of the President and, secondly, of the Senate; that is, of the entire treaty-making power of the United States. Under Article I alone, no matter how uncertain and undetermined the words of definition and limitation might be, there could be no danger of any question being forced to arbitration which in the opinion of the President and the Senate was not properly arbitrable. But these treaties did not stop at that point. Articles II and III provide for an international commission of inquiry. These articles are identical, in substance if not in language, with the provisions of The Hague conventions for the establishment of commissions of inquiry, whose duty it shall be, after a delay of a year, to inquire into all the facts relating to the question in difference between two nations and to report thereon to the parties to the difference. The Hague provisions declare specifically that the report of such commissions of inquiry shall in no sense be an award, but shall be merely a statement of facts upon which the parties to the controversy may take such action as they see fit. It is just at this point that Articles II and III of these treaties depart entirely from The Hague provisions. In clause 3 of Article III in these treaties it is provided that the high commission of inquiry shall be authorized to decide, if there is not more than one dissenting vote, whether the question before them is arbitrable; and if they decide this question in the affirmative, then clause 3 of Article III declares unconditionally that the question shall be arbitrated. It is this clause which has engendered all the discussion which has taken place in regard to these treaties and which has caused the Senate committee and, I believe, the Senate itself to feel that either some amendment or some clear explanation of the clause in the ratifying resolution is absolutely essential. Clause 3 of Article III has been differently interpreted by those who have discussed it. The Secretary of State, for whom I have not only the greatest regard as a friend but the highest respect as a lawyer, and whose legal opinion justly carries very great weight, has stated, in a speech which he made at Cincinnati, that clause 3 of Article III leaves the constitutional powers of the Senate, in dealing with a special agreement, wholly unimpaired. That is also the view of the Senator from North Dakota, of the Senator from Ohio, and, no doubt, of some others. I am unable personally to interpret that clause in that way. It seems to me to be final in its character, and that if it were adopted the Senate would be morally, if not legally, debarred from considering the arbitrability of any question involved in a special agreement which the high commission had previously declared to be arbitrable. I think this view is shared by a majority of those who have carefully considered these treaties. But whichever view is correct, there can be no doubt that the mere existence of divergent opinions as to the meaning of clause 3 makes it absolutely necessary either to omit that clause from the treaty or to interpret it in the ratifying resolution in such a way that no doubt can ever arise as to the understanding upon which it was accepted by the Government of the United States. This is essential, because if the view which I and others hold should be correct and should be held to be correct by other nations and by the commissions of inquiry for which the treaties provide, a situation would then be created to which, in my judgment, this Government ought never to assent. The reasons for refusing to assent to clause 3 of Article III, if interpreted as I interpret it, are two. One is the constitutional objection that it involves a delegation of the treaty-making power; the other, which is the controlling reason and one that can not in my judgment be set aside, is that, if I correctly interpret that clause, it causes the United States to make a promise which everyone knows would not be kept under certain contingencies and if certain situations should arise. Let me take these reasons in their order and speak first of the constitutional objection.

Under this clause of Article III, as I read it, if the high commission of inquiry decides that a given question which has been submitted to them for investigation is, in their judgment, arbitrable, the President and the Senate are then bound morally and in honor not to object to the special agreement which follows on the ground that the subject of that agreement is not arbitrable. In other words, the President and the Senate would have divested themselves of the right to pass upon the arbitrability of the question involved in the special agreement. Whether the subject of a treaty or agreement is one upon which a treaty or agreement can properly be made is, of course, the most vital point involved, and it is precisely the decision of this vital point which is taken from the treaty-making power of the United States as established by the Constitution and given to the high commissions of inquiry which are to be established in the future in accordance with the terms of these treaties. Does this transfer of authority, so far as the right to consider the arbitrability of any given question is concerned, constitute a delegation of the treaty-making power?

In Field against Clark (U. S. Repts., 143, p. 692) the court says: That Congress can not delegate legislative power to the President is a principle universally recognized as vital to the integrity and maintenance of the system of government ordained by the Constitution.

The court then quoted, with approval, from Locke's appeal (72 Pa. St., 491-498) the following words:

The legislature can not delegate its power to make a law.

And then said:

What has been said is equally applicable to the objection that the third section of the act invests the President with treaty-making power.

The Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Lamar dissented, but not upon these propositions. The question at issue in Field against Clark was whether a certain provision of the tariff act was a delegation of legislative and treaty-making power or not, but the whole court was agreed on the proposition that the legislative and treaty-making powers could not be delegated. I take it that this general principle is not open to dispute, and that the only point involved here is whether the third clause of Article III constitutes a delegation of the treaty-making power. It may also be properly said in this connection that when the general arbitration treaties submitted by President Roosevelt in December, 1904, were before the Senate the Senate took the ground that these treaties attempted to delegate the treaty-making power to the President, and by an overwhelming vote inserted the word "treaty" in the arbitration treaties then before them, thus securing the submission to the Senate of all special agreements which might be made under the terms of the proposed treaties. I recall this fact because it shows that the Senate then took the ground laid down by the court in Field against Clark that the treaty-making power could not be delegated, in whole or in part, to the President, and a fortiori could not be delegated to any outside body.

In the course of the public discussion, which this question has caused, Mr. Rogers, the dean of the Yale Law School, with the acumen and learning which one would expect from the occupant of that important position, referred to postal treaties as precedents which sustained the proposition that clause 3 of Article III did not involve a delegation of the treaty-making power so far as to be obnoxious to the general principle. The history and practice of the Government in regard to postal treaties or conventions are not unknown to the Senate, and if Mr. Rogers had extended his researches beyond the act of 1872, I think it possible that he might have seen reason to attach less value to postal treaties as precedents bearing upon the case now presented. From the beginning of the Government to the present day postal treaties, conventions, or agreements have never been submitted to the Senate for its advice and consent, as all other treaties and conventions have been submitted; that is, postal agreements in any form have never been regarded as falling within the jurisdiction of the treaty-making power. The determination of the rates of foreign postage has never been regarded from the adoption of the Constitution to the present time as a function of the treaty-making power imposed by the Constitution upon the President and Senate of the United States. It will not be out of place, I think, to trace briefly the course of governmental action in regard to settling the rates of foreign postage. In the act establishing the Post Office Department, approved February 20, 1792, it is provided in section 26 as follows:

The Postmaster General may make arrangements with the postmasters in any foreign country for the reciprocal receipt and delivery of letters and packets through the post offices.

This clause was repeated in the same words in the act of 1794, the act of 1799, and the act of 1825, and upon this simple provision the entire system of treaties and conventions for determining the rates of foreign postage has been built up. All these acts, it may also be mentioned in passing, fixed the rates to be charged for foreign postage in the United States, and authorized the Postmaster General to make arrangements for the receipt and delivery of letters and packets with the captains of vessels which carried mails. Not many years after the passage of the act of 1825, the cheapening of postal rates on domestic letters and the development of steam transportation made it obvious that the simple arrangements authorized by the early acts were inadequate, especially when it became necessary to protect the United States against unfair discrimination in the postal rates of other countries. Accordingly in the act to reduce and modify the rates of postage in the United States, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1851, the following provision was made:

The Postmaster General, by and with the advice and consent of the President of the United States, shall be, and he hereby is, authorized to reduce or enlarge, from time to time, the rates of postage upon all letters and other mailable matter conveyed between the United States and any foreign country, for the purpose of making better postal arrangements with other governments, or counteracting any adverse measures affecting our postal intercourse with foreign countries.

By this statute the rates on foreign postage were no longer fixed by law, but the power to determine what they should be was left to the Postmaster General so that he might be able to secure fair rates from other countries. By this statute, also, power was conferred upon the Postmaster General, by and with the advice and consent of the President, to make arrangements for postal rates with foreign governments instead of with the postmasters in foreign countries at the ports of delivery, as had been provided by the old laws. Under this new act successive Postmasters General made conventions with many countries in regard to reciprocal rates of postage, and these conventions were in the ordinary treaty form and were signed by the duly empowered officers of the governments concerned. In 1872 another act was passed, consolidating and codifying the postal rates, and this statute provided as follows:

For the purpose of making better postal arrangements with foreign countries, or to counteract their adverse measures affecting our postal intercourse with them, the Postmaster General, by and with the advice and consent of the President, may negotiate and conclude postal treaties or conventions, and may reduce or increase the rates of postage on mail matter conveyed between the United States and foreign countries.

This recognized by name the conventions which it had been customary to make in previous years and also added the word "treaties," which made it look superficially as if the treaty-making power had to that extent been delegated. Under this clause many conventions were made, and the United States became, in 1897, a member of the International Postal Union. The use of the word "treaties," however, has really no significance in regard to the treaty-making power in this connection, for, as I have shown, no postal conventions were ever submitted to the Senate. The whole matter of foreign postage was arranged by statute from the beginning of the Government, and the power to deal with foreign postage was committed to the Postmaster General in exactly the same way as the transmission of domestic letters and the making of contracts for carrying the mails within the United States. The words "treaties and conventions" were used in the statute of 1872 simply as a matter of convenience, and the conventions of the middle of the last century and the modern Postal Union are merely outgrowths of the system established in the act of 1792, by which the Postmaster General was authorized to make arrangements with postmasters in other countries for the receipt and delivery of foreign mails. In other words, the matter of foreign postage and the transmission of foreign mails was dealt with by Congress under the specific power which the Constitution gives it to establish post offices and post roads. Of course, carrying the mails and fixing rates of postage are necessary incidents of the power to establish post offices, for a post office without mails is inconceivable. Congress also had the undoubted right to deal with this matter under its general power to regulate foreign commerce, to which, again, the transmission of letters is a necessary incident. In fact, all our treaties of amity, commerce, and navigation are based on the understanding that we maintain with other nations the comity which is universal among all civilized peoples, and of which the interchange of letters, newspapers, and periodicals is a necessary and inalienable part. It is thus apparent that the practice of making postal treaties and conventions has no relation whatever to the treaty-making power, and the authority given to the President to make such treaties and conventions is not and never has been a delegation of that power and has never been so considered. The authority conferred upon the President in this respect comes from the constitutional authority to regulate commerce with foreign nations and to establish post offices and post roads, which is much more specific than the treaty-making power and removes from that general authority the particular subject of postal communication. No precedent for the delegation of the treaty-making power is to be discovered in the postal conventions which we habitually make with other countries.

The case in regard to Indian treaties, which have also been mentioned in this connection, is even simpler. The Indian treaties have no application here, for there has been in that case no suggestion of any delegation of power. From 1789 to 1871 treaties with the Indians were made by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, in the same way as treaties with foreign nations. (See Butler, Treaty-making Power, Vol. II, pp. 197-199.) In 1867, by an amendment to the deficiency bill, the President and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs were prohibited from entering into treaties with the Indians unless appropriation was made for the expense of the negotiation. Four months later this law was repealed, and in 1871 the Indian appropriation bill provided that no Indian nation or tribe should be acknowledged or recognized as an independent nation with whom the United States could contract by treaty. This ended our treaty relations with the Indians, whose affairs have since that time been regulated by statute, and the last Indian treaty under the old system was ratified by the Senate on February 26, 1869. There is, of course, no delegation of treaty-making power to be found in these facts and no precedent can be drawn from them. Neither Indian treaties, which were always made with the ratification of the Senate until such treaties were prohibited by law, nor postal treaties or conventions, which were never submitted to the Senate, have any bearing on a case like that presented by the two treaties now pending.

The suggestion, therefore, that in these two directions precedents could be found for the delegation of the treaty-making power fails to the ground. There is no such precedent in either case, and we come back to the proposition already cited, which was so broadly laid down by the court in the case of Field against Clark, that neither the legislative nor the treaty-making power can be delegated, and, as I have said, the only question is whether the provision of clause 3 constitutes such delegation. On that point every man must decide for himself, for there are no precedents to guide us. It will not be contested that the making of an arbitration treaty, whether special or general, is an exercise of the treaty-making power and could not be delegated—that is, we could not establish a commission, whether composed of citizens of the United States or of foreigners or of both, to make special agreements for the arbitration of differences with other countries, as they might arise, which would bind the United States. No one for a moment would sustain such a proposition as that. We could no more delegate the power to make an arbitration treaty to any outside body than we could delegate the power to make a boundary treaty or a treaty of peace or an extradition treaty. The courts have held repeatedly that, when Congress confers upon the President the right to put a certain law into operation or to stop the operation of a given law on the occurrence of a certain contingency, this does not constitute a delegation of the legislative power. Of the soundness of this rule I think there can be no question, but in the delegation of the power to make an arbitration treaty there is no room for the application of this rule. It is not a case in which a law is to come into operation when a certain event occurs. It is the unlimited power to make a treaty, the terms of which are not known and which shall be the supreme law of the land on the occurrence of events which no one can define beforehand. If it be true, and I think it can not be questioned, that the President and the Senate can not delegate to an outside commission the power to make a treaty, it seems to me that it necessarily follows that they can not delegate the power to make a part of any treaty. To do so does not involve putting into force a defined law contingent upon the occurrence of a certain event, but is the exercise of a constitutional power in whole or in part. If we can not delegate the whole power I do not see how it can be argued that we can delegate a part of it, and it certainly can not be urged that the arbitrability of any question is not a vital and essential part of the power to make an arbitration treaty.

For these reasons it seems to me, personally, perfectly clear that clause 3 of Article III, under the interpretation which I give it, involves a delegation of the treaty-making power. I am aware that eminent lawyers like Mr. Choate and Mr. Edmunds think that no delegation of power is here involved, while Mr. Olney, who is not only one of our most eminent lawyers, but who held with great distinction the high offices of Attorney General and Secretary of State of the United States, takes a different view and concurs in principle with that which I have tried to set forth. I can only say that for myself I am utterly unable to conceive that the provisions of clause 3 of Article III, as I interpret it, do not constitute a delegation of the treaty-making power. As the Secretary of State interprets that clause, it of course does not, because he does not give it the meaning which I attribute to it, but with the meaning generally given to the clause it seems to me that it is a delegation of the treaty-making power, which we know from the language of the court in Field against Clark can no more be delegated than the legislative power.

The constitutional question of the delegation of power is not, however, the controlling reason for the objection to clause 3 of Article III, if it is given the interpretation which I place upon it. I do not, in saying this, underrate the importance of any doubt concerning the constitutionality of this or any other clause, whether in a bill or treaty, but there is a division of opinion on the constitutional question here presented and opposing views in regard to it, as I have just said, are held by lawyers and jurists of the greatest eminence. The other objection, which is neither constitutional nor legal, is open, in my opinion, to no such uncertainty, if my interpretation of clause 3 of Article III be correct that we make in that clause a promise to arbitrate any question which the high commission of inquiry declares to be arbitrable. We should in this way divest the treaty-making power of the United States—not only the Senate but the President—of all opportunity to say whether under certain contingencies the question involved in a special agreement is arbitrable or not. It is needless for me to point out that in every agreement for the arbitration of a specific difference between two nations the most important, the most vital question to be decided is whether it is an arbitrable question; that is, whether it comes within the limitations prescribed by Article I of this treaty.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question.

Mr. LODGE. I should be obliged if the Senator from Mississippi would let me complete my argument, and then I will answer any question, if I can.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It comes right here, at this very point. It would be useless later.

Mr. LODGE. Go on and state it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will not ask it if it interferes with the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. No; go on and ask it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Suppose the President of the United States did not raise the question of the justiciableness of a question sought to be submitted to arbitration; suppose that, without invoking clause 3 of Article III at all, because it was unnecessary to invoke it, the Executive of the United States admitted the arbitrability or the justiciableness of the question. Then there would be a special agreement which would come to the Senate, upon which the Senate would pass in the usual constitutional way?

Now, then, I understand the Senator to say that, under clause 3 of Article III, a question having been raised as to the justiciableness, and that question of interpretation having been submitted to the high court of inquiry and it having been decided that the question is justiciable, that then, unless that decision that it was justiciable came back to the Senate, the Senate would be deprived of some of its constitutional power.

Now, the question I want to ask the Senator is this: Suppose the President had decided that the question was justiciable, without any reference to the high court and this special agreement was entered into, would not the President's action in deciding that it was justiciable be just as much—and no more and no less—an intrenchment upon the prerogatives of the Senate as the decision of the high court of inquiry?

Mr. LODGE. Not at all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. One more question, because the Senator can answer both at the same time. Does clause 3 of Article III do anything except this, when the question of justiciableness is decided, if it is decided that the question is justiciable, to put the whole matter back under clause 1, where it would have been if the President had decided it was justiciable in the beginning?

Mr. LODGE. As it appears to me, if the President sends in a treaty or a special agreement of arbitration, and he thinks, as of course he must think, if he sends it for our approval, that the question involved is justiciable, that is his view as a part of the treaty-making power, and in no way binds the Senate or impairs the powers of the Senate.

My sole point is that, as it is possible under this treaty to take any question before the high commission without the assent of the President and without the assent of the Senate, if the high commission then decides that it is arbitrable, the President is debarred from raising the question of the arbitrability of it under clause 3, and we should be debarred when the agreement comes to us.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But suppose the President should decide that a question was arbitrable and justiciable and the Senate did not agree with him?

Mr. LODGE. The Senate is not bound by anything the President does.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Neither do I so maintain. But suppose the President should decide that a question was justiciable. Would we be bound—

Mr. LODGE. Certainly not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. To accept his decision, by anything the President does? And if not bound by the whole treaty to accept his interpretation, why are we any more bound to accept that of the high court?

Mr. LODGE. We should be no more bound than he is to accept the decision of these people in a certain contingency. My whole point is that clause 3 of Article III does bind us. The commission of inquiry is not put in the place of the President. Their relation in this matter when they decide on the arbitrability of a question is an independent relation, and their action binds, according to my interpretation of the clause.

All other questions connected with a special agreement are insignificant compared to this one, and yet it is upon this vital question that we promise to set aside the treaty-making power of the United States and entrust it to an outside commission unknown to the Constitution.

In dealing with this promise made, as I conceive, in the last clause of the third article there are two important facts of a general character which should be carefully remembered at the outset. One, as I have already pointed out, is that if we make these treaties with France and England we can not, without creating a most undesirable situation, refuse to make treaties in precisely similar terms with other friendly nations who may ask us to do so, and our possible relations with all other nations are by no means the same as those which so fortunately exist between this country on the one side and Great Britain and France upon the other. These treaties, therefore, must be considered not simply with relation to England and France but as to their meaning and effect if adopted with all other nations.

The second fact to be remembered—and this is often and generally overlooked—is that all the differences with other nations in which we shall be involved will be American questions. We have no interests in Europe. It has been our settled policy from the foundation of the Government to hold ourselves entirely aloof from all European questions. This attitude was recommended by Washington in his farewell address, and we have never departed from it. On the other hand, the powers of Europe have now and always have had many important interests in the American Hemisphere. If you will glance over the list of arbitrations in which the United States has taken part, you will find, I think, that without exception they concerned American questions. Pecuniary claims may of course arise anywhere, but apart from these, which are not serious as a matter of international difference, all the great arbitral settlements in which the United States has taken part, with the exception of the Alabama claims, have concerned American boundaries or the rights of the United States on the American Continent, under treaties or otherwise. In assenting to general arbitration treaties, therefore, we must go much further and give much more than any other nation, for the questions which we promise to arbitrate are, in the necessity of things, American questions. Other nations promise to arbitrate American questions, but the whole great range of European and Eastern questions in which they are involved are not affected by any treaty which they make with us. There is therefore reason for much greater care upon our part in making general arbitration treaties than on the part of the European powers, for with us these treaties embrace questions of primary interest to the United States, but only questions of secondary interest to the powers of Europe. Owing to this fact we have in the past been put, again and again, in a position, under an arbitration, where we might easily lose and could by no possibility gain, even if the case was decided wholly and absolutely in our favor. Unfortunately for the cause of arbitration, the decisions of arbitral tribunals have commonly resulted in a diplomatic compromise, and on account of the conditions which I have just set forth we have been at a disadvantage, because any compromise necessarily fell short of our position, whereas with the nations with whom we joined in arbitration the case was exactly reversed, for they, submitting only American questions, could not lose materially and were tolerably certain to gain something. These two general conditions, inherent in our geographical position and in our uniform and traditional policy, constitute, as I have said, a most important reason for peculiar care on our part in making either special arbitral agreements or general promises of arbitration in future cases. We do not and we can not enter upon these agreements on an equality of risk with the other nations with which we treat. This consideration also disposes of the argument, which I have seen advanced, that we could afford to agree to anything that was set down in a treaty of arbitration, because the nations with which we made it agreed to it and were as much affected by it as we. They are not as much affected by it as we, because the principal interests of the nations of Europe are not involved and never will be involved in any treaty of arbitration which they make with us, whereas with the United States the exact reverse is the case.

Now, assuming constantly that the interpretation of this clause is that which I have given to it, and which I say again most people give to it, let us see where such a promise would lead. There may be, I suppose, persons who are willing to submit the arbitrability of every international question that can possibly arise to the decision of an outside commission made up in whole or in part of the citizens or subjects of foreign nations. To such persons there is of course nothing perilous or objectionable in clause 3 of Article III, as I have interpreted it, but if those who hold this view are consistent they are, according to my thinking, neither patriotic nor prudent. In the present stage of human development they occupy a position which to my mind is extremely dangerous to the peace and welfare of their own country. But the great mass of the people of this country believe that there are certain questions that might arise which they would never consent to submit to the arbitration of any outside tribunal. The President of the United States, in a speech which he made at Rochester soon after the close of the last session, admitted this, saying that of course there were certain questions which were not arbitrable, and mentioning three at least as coming within this category. From the President down I believe this to be, as I have said, not only the view of the American people, but of every responsible and reflecting public man. Even if a President and Senate thought otherwise there are certain questions which the people of the United States would never permit any President or any Senate to submit to arbitration. Now, under the clause, as I am interpreting it, I know of no question which we should not be bound to arbitrate if the high commission of inquiry decided it to be arbitrable. It is no reply to say that we should have the right to appoint American members of these high commissions and that no American commissioners would ever agree to the arbitration of such questions as I have in mind. Such an assertion is equivalent to declaring that we are to avoid a promise which we are not willing to fulfill by packing the tribunal to which its arbitrability is submitted; in other words, that we are to defeat and absolutely disregard the entire purpose of these provisions for a high commission of inquiry, which are taken bodily from The Hague convention, and to which clause 3 of Article III is an appendage unknown to The Hague agreement. We can not afford to make a promise which we know in certain cases we should not keep and then deliberately propose to escape from our promise by packing the tribunal to which we have agreed to submit the question. Neither peace nor any other good cause can be advanced by such devious methods as that. If we are to make the promise, as I understand it in that clause, then I say we are morally bound, bound in honor, bound by every obligation of good faith to keep the promise exactly as it is intended. Let me now, as illustrating the dangers to which such a promise would expose us, state a few examples of the perils which I foresee.

Suppose, for example, some great Eastern power should directly or indirectly take possession of a harbor on the west coast of Mexico for the purpose of making it a naval station and a place of arms. I am using no imagination in suggesting such a case. It is not very long since an indirect movement was begun, and it is apparently still on foot, to obtain possession for a foreign power of Magdalena Bay, so I may fairly suppose that such a case might arise. If it did, we should immediately intervene. We should declare that this was a violation of our constant policy known as the Monroe doctrine. The nation seeking the station on the coast of Mexico would then say, "Very well, let us take this to arbitration." We could not help ourselves, for under the terms of the treaty either party to a dispute can bring the other before the high commission of inquiry, and the Monroe doctrine would then be submitted to them by us as a bar to the arbitrability of the question.

The Monroe doctrine in general terms would not and could not, as an abstract proposition, come before the commission, but it would appear there inevitably as incidental to the taking of the harbor on the west coast of Mexico as proposed by the foreign power. A year may, and in practice would certainly, elapse before the matter would be taken up by the commission, and during that time the foreign power would go on strengthening its hold upon the position which it had taken. Then comes the investigation of the commission. Under the general principles of international law the foreign power would have a perfect right to secure that land by purchase or treaty. The only bar that we could plead to their doing so would be that the action of the foreign power threatened our safety and violated our settled policy; that is, the Monroe doctrine. What chance do you think the Monroe doctrine would have before a commission made up in part of persons not Americans? The Monroe doctrine is not international law. It is the policy of the United States, declared after ample consideration as essential to its safety, and the strength of the doctrine is exactly that of the power of the United States and of its Navy. Suppose the commission decided it was an arbitrable question. Do you think the American people would arbitrate it? I do not, and I do not think it ought to be arbitrated. We should decline to arbitrate it, and the treaty would be disregarded, with all the unpleasant consequences which a disregard of treaty obligations always involves.

Take another example. The Galapagos Islands lie not far from the western mouth of the canal. They belong to Ecuador. Let us suppose, what has happened in the past on more than one occasion, and even before the building of the canal was contemplated, that some western or eastern power was reported as intending to buy those islands. This again is not an imaginary case. Inquiries have been made of Ecuador, as I have said, on more than one occasion whether she contemplated the sale of those islands, and she has been told politely and diplomatically that if those islands were to be sold there was only one purchaser in the world. Suppose, I say, they should now be offered for sale and some western or eastern power should try to buy them. Again we should intervene and we should find ourselves discussing before an arbitral tribunal whether those islands, essential to the safety of the canal, could be sold to some foreign power in flagrant violation of the Monroe doctrine.

Pass to the other mouth of the canal. Look on the map. You will find a very important island there called Curacao. It belongs to Holland, which is entirely satisfactory to us. Suppose that in the chances and changes of European politics that island should pass into the control of a great military power. Do you think we should submit that question to arbitration, no matter what we promised? I do not think we should. I think the promise would be broken. I do not think the American people, who have paid for and built the canal, propose to have it endangered by the presence of any new neighbors at either end.

Take the question of immigration—Chinese or, if you prefer, Asiatic. We now have a treaty of general arbitration with China and could hardly refuse to make another along the new lines. The question of immigration in that case and in others might be a question arising under a treaty, and nothing is more arbitrable than the interpretation of treaties, or it might be merely a general question as to how far our general treaties permitted us to pass exclusion or restriction laws in regard to immigrants. I see no way to prevent such a question under this treaty being brought before an arbitral tribunal if the high commission of inquiry should decide it to be arbitrable. I do not believe the American people would ever permit such a question to be arbitrated. I do not think it ever would be arbitrated by the people of the United States, and any promise that we would arbitrate it would be broken in an instant.

Take the question of the southern bonds. I do not think that question ought to go to arbitration. My friend the Senator from Mississippi thinks it could not be taken to arbitration because the claim concerns the debts of States. It seems to me, if he will permit me to say so, that that is a question of the merits and does not touch the question of jurisdiction. The question first to be decided is the question of jurisdiction, and what is to prevent any country from asking that these pecuniary claims should go before a high commission of inquiry to decide whether they are arbitrable? We could not prevent their going there by saying anything about the States. One party to the controversy can take the question before the high commission, and there the question of the arbitrability of those bonds would be decided. Then, if you please, the argument that they are State obligations could be advanced upon the merits of the case, but it seems to me to be forgotten by those who lightly dismiss this question that foreign nations do not recognize and can not recognize a State of the Union. The only authority that a foreign power can recognize in this instance is the United States. In our foreign policy the States under the Constitution have no existence. As a general proposition, what is there more proper for arbitration than a pecuniary claim? If we can not arbitrate pecuniary claims, what can we arbitrate? These particular claims are based on bonds signed and sealed with the seals of the several States. Owing to the circumstances under which those debts were contracted, we believe that they were in very large measure, if not entirely, fraudulent. We separate them and take them out from the ordinary class of pecuniary claims. Our reasons for doing so are well known to us and rest on the broad grounds of justice and right, but the world neither knows nor understands our reasons. Whatever the decision of the high commission might be on this question, I for one do not believe in ever permitting the question of these bonds to go before any outside tribunal. They are our own concern. I do not believe that they should be even discussed before a board composed in whole or in part of foreigners, and you can not prevent their being brought there if you assent to this treaty without any modification of clause 3.

Are you ready to submit to arbitration the question of the right of expatriation which we have supported, insisted upon, and enforced for more than fifty years? Will you arbitrate with Russia the question of her right to discriminate against certain classes of American citizens on the ground of race and religion, as we discriminate against certain immigrants on the grounds of crime and disease? I am not willing to submit those questions to arbitration, and I will not promise to do so. It is easy to show that there are other questions not properly arbitrable which might be brought before this commission. The tolls to be charged by us in the Panama Canal, which we have built at our own expense, might be brought before a tribunal, in whole or in part composed of foreigners, to be fixed and determined by them. Worse than this, our title to our own canal might be called in question. Three successive Secretaries of State have refused, and properly refused, to submit our title to the canal to arbitration, and now under clause 3 of Article III, as I interpret it, we might be forced to submit that title to The Hague court or some outside tribunal. The men who rejected the Hay-Herran treaty because they hoped to extort more than ten millions from us for their own use and behoof are even now struggling, through assistants in this country who mean to share the spoil, to secure by arbitration what they failed to obtain by blackmail and could not seize by violence. Our title to the canal or to our territory anywhere is not to be dragged before any arbitral tribunal for examination and determination, and nothing should be subscribed to by us which by any twisting could be construed into a promise that we would submit such a question to any judgment but our own. I might cite other instances of questions not arbitrable or to be arbitrated, but I have said enough to show what might happen under the last clause of Article III.

As it is to-day those questions to which I have alluded are peacefully at rest. There is not a nation on earth that would for one moment think of raising those questions with the United States; but if clause 3 is ratified and is given the interpretation which I put upon it—and the final decision as to the interpretation will rest with the high commission itself—we shall find all these questions starting into life. We are tempting, we are inviting, other nations to raise these perilous and vital questions, which now slumber peacefully in a sleep which should know no waking. If they were raised, they would come in such form, some of them, that this treaty would be blown to the winds and be as if it had never been. That is the danger which I apprehend, and I apprehend it not because I fear for the United States, not because I am alarmed lest the Monroe doctrine be overturned and our immigration laws interfered with, for neither this nor any other treaty will be permitted to destroy the safeguards which certain policies throw around the United States. I fear it because I am the friend of peace, and, in my opinion, no greater disaster could befall the cause of peace than to make a promise in a treaty designed to promote peace which we know when we make it will not be kept in certain contingencies. Nothing could do more harm to the cause we all have at heart than such an outcome as this. When we make a general promise of arbitration we must make nothing more and nothing less than a promise which we intend to fulfill to the very letter of the agreement. There is no other way in which peace or any other great cause can be advanced. The cause of peace can not be promoted by eloquent allusions to plowshares, pruning hooks, and olive branches, still less by pretense or by cloudy or furtive devices. I will go just as far as I can in promoting peace, but I will not retard the cause of peace by promising on paper what I know can not be performed in action. No country has done more to further the cause of peace by arbitration than the United States, and nothing could be more harmful to the cause of peace than to have the United States, the leader in the good work, make a promise which in any and every contingency she could not and would not keep. Washington, I know, is not regarded in these days by advanced political thinkers as an authority of much weight in dealing with public questions, and yet I can not forbear citing the wise words which he uttered in his first message transmitting an Indian treaty. He said then:

It doubtless is important that all treaties and compacts formed by the United States with other nations, whether civilized or not, should be made with caution and executed with fidelity.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I feel very strongly that the paragraph which has been the cause of all this discussion should be placed beyond the possibility of doubt. I should prefer to leave it out of the treaty, where it is of no advantage and has simply aroused suspicion, misgivings, and opposition; but I have no desire in a matter like this to insist upon my own preference as to the method of amendment. If it is thought best not to take the clause from the treaty, then let it be interpreted in the resolution of ratification, which becomes part of the treaty, so that no man can ever misunderstand it. It is for this reason that I offer a resolution of ratification which gives to that clause the meaning which those who favor the unamended treaty say it now possesses and which all the rest of the world say it ought to possess. Such a proposition is entitled to command every vote.

We have, as a Nation, rendered real service to the cause of peace on earth. We hope that a still further service may be rendered by these treaties. But no good end is served—on the contrary, great harm may be caused—by employing doubtful language or by overrating what has already been accomplished or what we are now striving to do. These treaties do not mark the dawn of universal peace as proclaimed in the thoughtful statements of the newspaper headlines. They are but one step, in a long march. Other steps have preceded them. Many, many others it is to be hoped will follow, all advancing us toward the haven where we would be. Slowly, very slowly, we have drawn ourselves out from the ceaseless welter of private wars which afflicted western civilization for more than a thousand years. Three hundred years more passed before we could get free from the old system of reprisals without declared and public hostilities, which amounted to private war among the citizens of different nations. Now we are in the last stage seeking to put an end to public and declared wars among the nations of the earth. In the last century progress was made. In the last twenty-five years the advance has been remarkable. But it would be worse than folly to suppose that in a few short years we can cover the last stage of a journey which consumed fifteen centuries in traversing the first two. We have girdled the globe and annihilated time with the electric current. We have brought space on the earth into subjection by the power of steam and electricity. We have entered upon the conquest of the air. But when we seek the establishment of lasting and universal peace we meet an element more elusive, more impalpable, more difficult of conquest than time or space or air, a condition more unchanged, unchanging, and unchangeable than any other in recorded history—human nature. It is easier to dominate the forces of nature and lead them captive than to subdue ourselves and master our own passions. The road which lies before us if we would secure universal peace is both long and steep. We shall not pass over it in one lifetime, nor, it is to be feared, in the lifetime of many generations. We shall have done our duty and earned our reward if under our leadership the march has been forward and onward and if we hold all we gain. We shall deserve well of posterity if—

The victors when they come,
When the forts of folly fall
Find our bodies at the wall.

If, then, we would succeed in our work, let us look facts in the face and not wander darkling, the victims of words and illusions. Actual peace will be, as it always has been, best preserved by enlightened men who are charged with the conduct of governments in crises which go beyond the strength of arbitral tribunals. In support of such men and for the diffusion of the spirit of peace and the habit of peaceful settlement of international disputes much can be done by promoting arbitration in every possible way. Herein lies the value of these treaties and all similar agreements. But this is the easiest part of the work. To attribute to these or any treaties of like character a force and effect which they do not possess does harm and not good. Instruments like these are important, but to treat them as if they were the be-all and the end-all here, and if when once attained wars would cease, is not only false but injurious.

I have a great respect for those who labor in the cause of peace, but I would have them look facts in the face. Even now while all the vast and well-endowed machinery of agitation has been put into operation to secure the ratification of these treaties, to which nobody is opposed, there is fighting in China and in Persia and declared war between Italy and Turkey. There are great fields for labor in the cause of peace. There it is possible to put peace in the place of actual and existent war, a more immediate service to humanity than reciprocal promises to arbitrate interchanged by nations between whom war is practically inconceivable. The treaties now pending with Nicaragua and Honduras will do more, if ratified, to stop the killing of men by their fellow men than any general arbitration treaties made by nations between which war is well-nigh impossible. I call these treaties to the attention of the friends of peace and ask them to consider the results of a similar treaty now existing with San Domingo.

Let me also remind them of certain facts in recent and present history. The total loss of life by wars during 1911 in actual battle amounted to 72,000, in round numbers, as compared with 13,000 in 1910, 68,000 in 1909, and 22,000 in 1908. In making this enumeration no account is taken of the large number who must have perished in massacres which have frequently characterized both the pending wars in China and Tripoli, but of which no estimate has been made. The losses as reported are as follows: China, 41,878; Tripoli, 13,309; Mexico, 7,624; Arabia, 2,790; Morocco, 1,913; Persia, 1,800; Central Africa, 1,249; Paraguay, 300; Haiti, 71; Honduras, 55; Portugal, 44; Spain, 41; Formosa, 30; Philippines, 62; Ecuador, 11. These are grievous statistics. We rejoice in our own peace, which basks beneath cloudless skies; but peace knows no boundaries, and here in these cold figures is told a tale of suffering and misery which cries aloud to all lovers of humanity for remedy, alleviation, and help. A few months ago three of the greatest nations of the world were on the verge of a war which would have been a disaster to mankind and a reproach to civilization. By the wisdom of those charged with the responsibilities of government and by the influence of the financial interests, which many eminent persons think unworthy and unfit to exist, war was happily avoided. There, indeed, was opportunity for the efforts of the organized friends of peace; and if such perils loom again upon the world, as they probably will, let those who have peace particularly in their keeping address themselves to what will be a really great task and seek to win what will be in truth a great and noble triumph.

Nothing probably has done more to retard real progress in these modern times than the widespread and apparently ineradicable belief that all human ills can be cured and cured at once by laws. There is much truth, too often forgotten, in the lines of Johnson:

How small of all that human hearts endure,
That part which laws or kings can cause or cure!

Wise principles of government and good laws can do and have done much for the benefit of humanity, but nothing is more fatal than to overestimate their power. To do so tends to breed in man the most deadly of all diseases which can afflict human society, the loss of self-dependence and the weak impulse to look for help to something or somebody outside one's self at every step upon the road of life. In the past three hundred years there have been enormous advances in political freedom, in the protection of human rights, and in guarding the weak from the oppression of the strong; but those advances, so great when we look back over the centuries, were slowly and painfully obtained. They did not come in a day or a year, or even in many years; they came little by little, but when they came in that way they were lasting. Mankind accepts all the benefits gained by those who have gone before, thinks exclusively of existing evils, and, as is right, looks forward only to future improvement. But that improvement can be obtained, as the improvements of the past have been obtained, only by slow degrees. American liberty and American institutions have thriven and been examples to the rest of the world because they were the work of a people who had been trained for many generations in civil liberty and intellectual freedom. In the French Revolution men tried to solve all these questions at a blow and one perfect constitution succeeded another, perishing like the lily of a day almost as soon as it was born. The French people had not passed through the long years of training, of slow advance, which had been the inheritance and the fortune of the people of the American Colonies and of the United States. We see with deep gratification the success and the permanency of the French Republic of to-day, but the principal cause of that success, in my opinion, is that the French people, one of the most brilliant and most enlightened people in the world, have now had a hundred years of training in the difficult art of self-government.

I know that men grow restless in the presence of the truth which lies in what I have just said. We all feel the natural human impatience to be rid at once of all the evils of our time, but we should take to heart the lesson that the great and lasting advances are those which have been slowly made, whereas those which were the offspring of a moment, which have tried to accomplish too much and sought a panacea where none was to be found, have not only perished, but have only too often left the cause of sane progress crippled and deformed and the condition of mankind worse even than it was before. We all rebel against the slowness of the movement toward the light and upward to the perfection which we must always seek, even though it may never be attained. Yet it is the true movement and the best one after all, and it is well perhaps to remember that—

While the tired waves, vainly breaking,
Seem here no painful inch to gain,
Far back, through creek and inlet making,
Comes silent, flooding in, the main,
And not by eastern windows only,
When daylight comes, comes in the light,
In front, the sun climbs slow, how slowly,
But westward, look, the land is bright.

NOTE.—In stating that no postal treaty had ever been submitted to the Senate I overlooked, despite a very careful search, certain postal treaties with Great Britain, New Granada, and Mexico, made respectively in 1844, 1848, and 1861, which were ratified by the Senate. A thorough examination which I have since been able to make shows that these treaties all contained a provision for the transit of mails across territory of the countries with which they were made—in the case of New Granada, across the Isthmus; in the case of Great Britain, through Canada; in the case of Mexico, over Mexican territory. This right to cross foreign territory could only be conferred by treaty and could only be arranged by treaty now. They are, therefore, not precedents for the ratification of postal conventions by the Senate, and confirm my original statement that purely postal arrangements were always treated as a matter of statute under the constitutional powers to establish post offices and post roads and regulate foreign commerce.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, we have just listened to an able, exhaustive, and instructive address delivered by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], which must have left a profound impression upon all Senators. I do not believe there is a Member of this body who does not appreciate the value of this intelligent and patriotic contribution to the discussion upon the arbitration treaties now before the Senate, and that it may be immediately available to us all I ask unanimous consent that the speech just delivered by the Senator from Massachusetts be printed forthwith as a public document (S. Doc. No. 353).

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection the order will be entered.

The order as agreed to was reduced to writing, as follows:

Ordered, That the address delivered in the Senate of the United States by Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE, February 29, 1912, on the pending arbitration treaties between the United States, Great Britain, and France, be printed as a public document.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate resume the consideration of legislative business.

The motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC UTILITIES COMMISSION.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I ask that the unfinished business may be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3512) to regulate public utilities in the District of Columbia and to confer upon the Commissioners of the District of Columbia the duties and powers of a public utilities commission.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, it has been so long since the bill was under consideration that I have somewhat forgotten the pending amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire, on page 34 of the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, as I recall, the motion was to strike out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment, if the Senator prefers, but the Secretary advises the Chair that the motion to strike out has been agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very well. Then, Mr. President, I move that the language which I send to the desk be incorporated in the bill at the point where the other language was stricken out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 34, line 9, after the word "forfeiture," it is proposed to insert the following words:

It shall be unlawful for any street railroad corporation, gas corporation, electrical corporation, telephone corporation, telegraph corporation, or other public-utility corporation, directly or indirectly, to acquire the stock of any other corporation, and every contract, transfer, agreement for transfer, or assignment of any such stocks shall be void and of no effect.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, would the Senator from New Hampshire agree to an amendment to the amendment which, in addition to prohibiting the acquirement of stock by a corporation in another corporation, would also forbid the ownership of it?

Mr. GALLINGER. I would agree to that.

Mr. BAILEY. Then, I suggest that, in line 4 of the amendment, following the words "directly or indirectly, to," to insert the words "own or to"; which will make it read "to own or to acquire." I think that probably will cover the case.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 4 of the amendment as printed, before the word "acquire," it is proposed to insert the words "own or to," so that it will read "to own or to acquire the stock of any other corporation," and so forth.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, it will be recalled that when the bill was under consideration before the Senate the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] took exception to the language of section 15, which deals with the matter of depreciation. I have consulted with that Senator, and he has said to me that he thinks it is wise to strike out that section and to leave that matter entirely in the hands of the commission. I am inclined to agree with that Senator that that would be the wise thing to do. Therefore I move to strike out section 15 from the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 17, beginning in line 1, it is proposed to strike out section 15 of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 15. That every public utility shall carry a proper and adequate depreciation account whenever the commission, after investigation, shall determine that such depreciation account can be reasonably required. The commission shall ascertain and determine what are the proper and adequate rates of depreciation of the several classes of property of each public utility. These rates shall be such as will provide the amounts required over and above the expense of maintenance to keep such property in a state of efficiency corresponding to the progress of the industry. Each public utility shall conform its depreciation accounts to such rates so ascertained and determined by the commission. The commission may make changes in such rates of depreciation from time to time as it may find to be necessary. The commission shall also prescribe rules, regulations, and forms of accounts regarding such depreciation which the public utility is required to carry into effect. The commission shall provide for such depreciation in fixing the rates, tolls, and charges to be paid by the public. All moneys in this fund may be expended in new constructions, extensions, or additions to the property of such public utility, or invested, and, if invested, the income from the investments shall also be carried in the depreciation fund. This fund and the proceeds thereof shall be used for no other purpose than as provided in this section and for depreciation unless with the consent and by order of the commission.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I offer a substitute for section 93, which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out section 93, as follows:

SEC. 93. That a sum sufficient to carry out the provisions of this act is hereby appropriated out of the revenues of the District of Columbia and not exceeding $40,000.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

SEC. 93. That the sum of $40,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated to carry out the provisions of this act, one-half out of revenues of the District of Columbia and one-half out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; and all moneys received from fines, forfeitures, and penalties shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, one-half to the credit of the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, some days ago I proposed an amendment by way of substitute for the pending bill. I desire now to offer it as an amendment to the pending bill. I wish to say in connection with that matter—

Mr. GALLINGER. Just one word, if the Senator please.

Mr. WORKS. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I wish to state that so far as I know the amendments which I have offered are all the amendments the committee desire through me to offer. Now, the Senator can call up his amendment.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I desire to say in connection with this subject that some of the amendments which have been made within the last few minutes meet some of the objections that I had to the bill, and which I desired to meet by the amendment which I have submitted. I considered, in the first instance, whether I should attempt to correct the bill by the various amendments that I thought to be necessary, or whether it were better to offer an entire substitute. I finally concluded to adopt the latter course with respect to it, and I desire now to submit that amendment.

It will be necessary for me to take up some of the time of the Senate in undertaking to point out and explain the differences between the two bills, and I would have to do that with reference to the amendments that have now been offered. I should very much prefer not to take the matter up now, and I may be able to do it in a great deal less time if I take it up at some later date, if that will be agreeable to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is a great deal of pressure for the passage of this bill.

Mr. WORKS. Yes; I understand that.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is a matter to which I have given a great deal of time, more than I would want to do if the work was to be again gone over with, and I had hoped that we might dispose of it to-day.

Mr. WORKS. I have no disposition, I think the Senator will understand, to delay the disposition of the bill. It is an important matter, and one to which I have given considerable attention, because it is one that I am particularly interested in.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator desire to have his amendment read, it being, as I understand, a bill which has been introduced in the other House?

Mr. WORKS. I intended to ask unanimous consent that the reading should be dispensed with. Its reading would take up probably an hour of time, but I can in less time than that explain the changes that would result from the adoption of the amendment. I desire to save all the time I can.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask the Senator from California, whose interest in this bill, I understand, is quite as intense as is my own, and he desires legislation as much as I do, if he will be prepared to-morrow to discuss the matter?

Mr. WORKS. Yes, sir; I shall.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very well, Mr. President. Then I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be now laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that will be done.

SENATOR FROM WISCONSIN.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to call up the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections in the Stephenson case.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the question of privilege called up by the Senator from Idaho.

The SECRETARY. Order of business 299, Senate resolution 136, directing the Committee on Privileges and Elections to investigate certain charges relative to the election of ISAAC STEPHENSON.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] to agree to the report of the committee.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I do not intend to protract my remarks in opening this debate. Inquiry was made yesterday at the close of the session as to the number of votes which had been received by each of the candidates for Senator, if we may term them candidates. At that time I did not have the figures before me. I will now give them, with the amounts expended by each, according to the official record.

Mr. STEPHENSON, at the primary, received 56,909 votes, and expended $107,793.05.

Mr. Cook, another candidate of the same character, received 47,825 votes, and expended $42,293.29.

Mr. Hatton, another such candidate for the Senate, received 35,552 votes and expended $26,413.

Mr. McGovern, the present governor of the State, then such candidate for the Senate, received 42,631 votes and expended $11,063.88.

The total amount expended by all those candidates was $188,563.23. The total vote received by those candidates was 182,917.

Some inquiry was made as to whether or not I conceded a statement that seems to have been found somewhere in the record that seven or eight hundred thousand dollars had been expended at the primary election. At the time the question was propounded I did not have the figures in mind. That statement has been made since I had had occasion to go through the record, and it has been some months now since this record was fresh in my mind. I find no justification for such statement, unless you take into account the amounts expended by all of the candidates for State, county, and lesser offices. It may be that the aggregate would or would not amount to such sum; but I do not feel that it is at all pertinent to the issue to inquire as to what was expended by the candidates for other offices than that of United States Senator. Merely as a matter of reference, I stated that one of the candidates for the supreme bench had filed a certain account and made certain expenditures. I merely did it to illustrate a point.

Mr. JONES. I merely want to suggest that possibly the Senator has in mind a statement made in the brief of Mr. Littlefield, wherein he estimates, I think, the total expenditures for all county and State officers at something over $800,000.

Mr. HEYBURN. He made that statement. Mr. Littlefield made his argument before the committee and filed a brief, but I saw the statement exaggerated with growing rapidity in the newspapers, until, I think, it finally reached a million. When a story like this once starts it is like a snowball going downhill on a cold day.

Mr. President, I think I have fairly opened for discussion and consideration the points involved in this inquiry. I do not feel at all inclined to go into an analysis of the testimony of the witnesses. It is no part of the duty of the committee, or of my duty as representing the report of the majority in this case, to do so. Every presumption is in favor of the validity of this election, because it was certified to this body by a sovereign State in a constitutional manner, and the citizen whose right is contested is now enjoying the rights and privileges of a Member of this body. The burden is upon those who would oust him to show reasons sufficient to overcome the presumption in his favor, because it is not the rule that a man shall be unseated merely upon a preponderance of testimony. We will take into consideration properly the fact that it is a constitutional office, filled in a constitutional manner, and held under the guaranty of a constitutional right.

With that statement I will have nothing more to say, unless there should develop some opposition to the motion which is pending, that the report of the committee be adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Idaho to adopt the report of the committee.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I understand there are several Members of the Senate who desire to speak on this motion, but I do not think they are quite ready yet. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. Bristow] has given notice that he will address the Senate on this matter to-morrow, so I do not think we should press it to a vote at this time.

Mr. KERN. What is the motion?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is to agree to the report of the committee.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I had understood that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. Bristow] was to enter upon the discussion this afternoon or to-morrow, and I had intended myself to follow him; I think there are also other Senators who desire to speak on this question.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I desire to say that it is getting quite late, and I prefer to begin my remarks in the morning immediately after the routine morning business, if that is agreeable to the Senator.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, we have now reached a point where I deem it proper to suggest that we agree upon a day upon which to take the vote. I was only waiting for this condition of affairs to arise. I now ask unanimous consent that on Tuesday, March 12, at 4 o'clock, a vote be taken upon the resolution and all amendments then pending.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, I have no opinion about this case, and I want to have an opportunity to look through the extended record. I say that without intimating in the slightest degree that I have any opinion, favorable or unfavorable, about it, but it is no small task to go through the record in this case. Here is a volume, one of the two volumes presented to us, that contains nearly a thousand pages, and I do not think the Senator from Idaho should ask that we consent to a particular date for a vote when this record has been in the hands of Members of the Senate less than two weeks time, I believe, and when we have been engaged with numerous other duties.

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will speak louder so that those of us on this side will have the benefit of what he is saying.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I say, I am not willing to consent to have a time fixed to vote upon this matter so soon, inasmuch as one of the volumes, the first volume, of the testimony contains nearly a thousand pages, and there is still another volume which I have not yet seen. I think we ought to have an opportunity to at least casually go through this record before the Senator asks that we be required to vote upon it. I do not wish to be captious, but I am not willing to consent to-day to having a date fixed as early as that which the Senator indicates.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Dakota objects.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I inquire what the proposition is?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made to the request preferred by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN].

Mr. KENYON. I suggest to the Senator from Idaho to make the date a little further along, say, March 28, so as to give us a little more time.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I am not inclined to be unreasonable about it. Six months will have elapsed from the time when the defendant, as I may term him, entered upon his defense, and six months is a long time in the life of a public man to be held up to ridicule and grilled before his constituency, the people of the United States, without having a vote as to whether or not he is guilty. If other Senators were in the same position as that occupied by Senator STEPHENSON in this case, and were to be confronted every morning and every night in the newspapers with the ridicule and the harsh treatment that confronts him in his old age, they would realize that there is a sense of humanity involved in this question which Senators should take into consideration.

Then, as to reading the record, we have gone to the trouble of having perhaps as complete a digest index made of this testimony as was ever made in the history of the United States Senate.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Can not the Senator agree to a date a little later on?

Mr. HEYBURN. Perhaps. We will see in a minute; but I want the RECORD to show that this was not a captious objection on my part.

Mr. CRAWFORD. No one has intimated that it was.

Mr. HEYBURN. The digest was made with a view to avoiding the necessity of reading every word in the record. Senators are not prosecutors here; they are merely to observe and consider the record of one of their associates in this body. It is not a man hunt to see if you can find some ground upon which to convict; it is rather an investigation to see if you can not find him to be clear of the charges against him; and there is no presumption against him.

With that expression, let us see how the calendar looks. I suggested Tuesday, March 12. The 14th is appropriated for ceremonies commemorative of our late associate, Senator Frye. The 15th of March is getting pretty far along. That will be more than three weeks hence. I would feel culpable in asking that a Member of this body situated as Senator STEPHENSON is should wait three weeks.

Mr. BRANDEGEE and Mr. TOWNSEND. It is only two weeks.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let us see. Well, it is between two and three weeks; but it is a long time to a man resting under these charges, and if Senators have given attention at all to the record in this case I am sure they must be convinced that it would be in the nature of a man hunt to go through it by sentence, word, and syllable to see if they can not find something in it upon which to transfix the life and destiny of their associate.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. KERN. I am in hearty accord with the last suggestion of the Senator from Idaho, that the date be fixed three weeks from to-day.

Mr. HEYBURN. The 15th of March. To-morrow will be the 1st of March—15 days from to-morrow. I am very reluctant to suggest a date so far ahead when I consider all the circumstances of this case. I would not personally impose that burden of waiting upon any man living, and I appeal to the generous impulses of Senators not to do it. Let us take up the case and discuss it. The facts will come out fast enough from this record. If there are those opposed to the adoption of the resolution they doubtless have the germ of the opposition well forward in their heads, and it will be promptly pronounced. Let us vote upon it at a much earlier day than that.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. I desire to say that I want this matter to come to a vote just as soon as possible consistent with the proper consideration of it by Senators. The record in the case is voluminous, and I think all Senators desire to do just what the Senator suggested a moment ago, namely, to act as judges in this matter and not as prosecutors; but we can not act as judges unless we have an opportunity to examine the record. During my short service in this body my experience has been that when a matter of importance is set down for a day certain then but very little attention is paid to it except by those who desire to discuss it, and I am not willing at this time to agree to any specific time to vote. I believe that if that is not done we will reach a vote even sooner than we could by an agreement.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then, of course, the discussion will have to go on now.

Mr. JONES. The discussion will go on if the Senator insists upon it, but the Senator can not drive this matter through at once, and the Senator will not gain time by simply insisting upon discussion at a late hour like this on a matter of such importance.

Mr. HEYBURN. We certainly will not gain time if the Senator says he will not agree to fix a time to vote.

Mr. JONES. I will not at this time.

Mr. HEYBURN. And it is not possible to lose any time under those circumstances, either.

Mr. JONES. I will not agree at this time to a definite day for a vote.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then the matter is before the Senate, and unless some Senator desires to proceed with the discussion, I call for a vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BRISTOW. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Dillingham	Martin, Va.	Richardson
Bourne	Gallinger	Martine, N. J.	Root
Brandeggee	Gardner	Nelson	Simmons
Briggs	Gore	Oliver	Smith, Ga.
Bristow	Heyburn	Overman	Smoot
Bryan	Johnson, Me.	Page	Stephenson
Burnham	Jones	Penrose	Sutherland
Crane	Kenyon	Perkins	Swanson
Culberson	Kern	Polindexter	Townsend
Cullom	Lodge	Pomerene	Warren
Curtis	McLean	Rayner	Williams

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-four Senators have answered to the roll call; not a quorum.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, March 1, 1912, at 2 o'clock p. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 29, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our God and our Father, we bless Thee for the bright skies above us, for the firm earth beneath us, for the bright hopes that cheer us, for the pure homes that love us, for the sunny smiles that greet us, for the best Government on the round earth, for the flag that floats o'er us, for the strong arms and brave hearts that would defend it, for the miracle of faith, hope, and love, for the heaven that waits above us and the good that we can do. Make us, we beseech Thee, worthy of these and the innumerable blessings which are showered down upon our pathways day by day; for Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PRESERVATION OF NIAGARA FALLS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House joint resolution 232, extending the operation of the act for the control and regulation of the waters of Niagara River, for the preservation of Niagara Falls, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced the following conferees: Mr. SULZER, Mr. FLOOD of Virginia, and Mr. FOSTER of Vermont.

DAM ACROSS SAVANNAH RIVER.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the conference report on the bill S. 4551, and I ask that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read the statement.

The conference report (No. 369) is as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 4551) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the building of a dam across the Savannah River, at or near the mouth of Stevens Creek, between the counties of Edgefield, S. C., and Columbia, Ga., approved August 5, 1909, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from the following amendment to said bill:

"Provided, That such dam shall be constructed, maintained, and operated in accordance with an act entitled 'An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters,' approved June 21, 1906, as amended by an act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters,' approved June 23, 1910."

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the following amendment of the House and agree to same:

"Amend the title so as to read: 'An act to extend the time for completion of a dam across the Savannah River, at or near the mouth of Stevens Creek, between the counties of Edgefield, S. C., and Columbia, Ga., authorized by an act approved August 5, 1909.'"

W. C. ADAMSON,
WILLIAM RICHARDSON,
F. C. STEVENS,

Managers on the part of the House.

KNUTE NELSON,
GEO. C. PERKINS,
THOMAS S. MARTIN,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

The Clerk read the statement, as follows:

STATEMENT.

On August 5, 1909, an act was approved granting the consent of Congress for the construction of a dam across the Savannah River in accordance with the provisions of the general dam act approved June 21, 1906.

The company interested at once proceeded to work and expended about $40,000 and contracted for the financing of the enterprise through the negotiation of bonds. They acquired a great deal of the riparian lands and flowage rights, but, although they commenced the work within one year and exercised due diligence in prosecuting the work, they were delayed by some litigation and securing some legislation bearing upon the securing of their necessary flowage rights which delayed them so as to render it impossible to complete the dam within three years. The Senate bill, the basis of this conference, was introduced for the purpose of extending the time allowed for the completion of the dam. Of course, the original act sought to be extended required the construction to proceed in accordance with the provisions of the general dam act of 1906. The House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce amended the Senate act so as to require also that the construction should proceed in accordance with the amended act approved June 23, 1910. The House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce also amended the title to conform to the provisions of the act. The House adopted the two amendments recommended by the committee and passed the Senate bill. The Senate disagreed to the amendments, asking a conference, to which the House agreed.

On further consideration of the two amendments in conference it appeared that the amendment of 1910 in express terms itself provided "that this limitation shall not apply to any corporation or individual heretofore authorized by the United States or by any State to construct a dam in or across a navigable waterway upon which dam expenditures of money have heretofore been made in reliance upon such grant or grants." In addition to the facts stated by the Secretary of War as to the commencement of work and the acquirement of flowage rights within a year the conferees were given additional information as to the expenditures of money and the financing of the property in reliance upon the original grant. Therefore we believe that the first amendment was erroneous, but that the second amendment was right, therefore the managers on the part of the House recede from the first amendment and the managers on the part of the Senate recede from the second amendment.

W. C. ADAMSON,
WM. RICHARDSON,
F. C. STEVENS,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House agree to the conference report.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ADAMSON. With pleasure.

Mr. MANN. If I recall, this dam was probably the only one authorized between the time that the committee determined not to report any more bills under the original dam act and the time when the amended dam act went into effect.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think that is true.

Mr. MANN. The original dam act and the original act under which this dam was proposed to be constructed contained provisions authorizing Congress at any time to repeal, alter, or amend either of the acts, as I recollect.

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. In this case it is said these people have commenced work, and that the 50-year limitation in the amended dam act, and possibly some other provisions in it, would come in conflict with the effort which they have already made to finance the proposition, and might, and probably would, as they claim, end their present arrangement.

Mr. BARTLETT. It would seriously embarrass it, anyhow, if the gentleman will permit me.

Mr. MANN. Does this act contain the provision for the right to alter, amend, or repeal?

Mr. ADAMSON. I think it does. I do not have it before me.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] moves to agree to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, the motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. While in the city of Trenton, N. J., yesterday morning, I purchased and read a copy of the Public Ledger, of Philadelphia, a newspaper, in which was contained an article evidently suggested by a Member of this House, which reflects upon me so far as my conduct as a Member of the House is concerned. I send this article to the Clerk's desk and ask that it be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the article.

The Clerk read as follows:

DONOHUE OBTAINED HARBOR INCREASE—PHILADELPHIA CONGRESSMAN SAYS MOORE HAD NOTHING TO DO WITH IT—SUBMITS LETTER AS PROOF—DECLARES HE PREFERS TO WORK QUIETLY, BUT CAN NOT SUBMIT TO APPARENT INJUSTICE.

To the editor of the Public Ledger:

Sir: Representative MOORE did not appear before the Rivers and Harbors Committee yesterday nor at any time to urge increase for Delaware River, and had absolutely nothing to do with increasing the amount.

MICHAEL DONOHUE.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 27.

[From a staff correspondent.]

WASHINGTON, February 27.

Representative DONOHUE to-night issued a statement to show that, as a member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, he was responsible for the increase in the appropriation for the 35-foot Delaware River channel from $700,000, originally apportioned, to $1,000,000. He was prompted to issue this statement because of reports that Representative J. HAMPTON MOORE had been partly responsible for inducing the members of this committee to take better care of the Delaware. Mr. DONOHUE's statement is:

"From a report in this morning's newspapers it would appear as if Representative J. HAMPTON MOORE did the real work in connection with the increase of appropriation for the Delaware River and that I merely seconded his efforts. The fact is Mr. MOORE had absolutely nothing to do with it. He did not appear before the Rivers and Harbors Committee, and hence made no argument in the matter.

"Representative H. O. YOUNG, a Republican member of the committee, sent me the following letter to-day:

"In response to your inquiry of to-day I have the pleasure to state that my recollection is very clear as to what occurred in the Committee on Rivers and Harbors yesterday relative to the increase of the appropriation for the Delaware River from $700,000 to $1,000,000. When I entered the committee room in the morning the committee had not yet convened. You approached me immediately and said that you were going to request the committee to increase the appropriation for the Delaware River and asked for my support. Immediately after convening you took the floor and advocated such increase most urgently, giving reasons therefor.

"After some general discussion a motion was made and carried unanimously to increase the amount to $1,000,000. No other person than yourself appeared before the committee on that occasion in favor of this proposition before its adoption."

"I have a letter of almost similar purport from Chairman SPARKMAN, and a majority of the members of the committee have made the following statement:

"In view of the fact that certain Philadelphia newspapers of this date in reporting an increase of $300,000 for the 35-foot channel project for the Delaware River do a great injustice to Representative DONOHUE, of Pennsylvania, we the undersigned members of the Rivers and Harbors Committee take pleasure in stating, in the interest of truth and justice, that the only argument made yesterday for an increase in the appropriation for the Delaware before our committee was made by Representative DONOHUE."

"In short, every member of the committee, irrespective of party affiliation, will freely admit the truth of the foregoing.

"I had rather continue to move along in my own quiet, unostentatious way and not be drawn into unseemly controversy, but in this instance there has been such violence done to truth and decency that I am constrained to make this statement with the hope that justice may occasionally come to other Members of the Philadelphia delegation in Congress, whose voices are now lost in the incessant din of the tom-tom of a single Member."

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I do not object to my friend the gentleman from Pennsylvania being heard, but I do not think this raises a question of personal privilege, and the precedent is one that ought not to be established. Therefore I will ask unanimous consent, if my friend desires it, that he may be heard on it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the courtesy offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT]. I have suggested to Members on the other side that the Member who indited the article, or who is responsible for it, be sent for, in order that I may explain my position regarding it in his presence.

The SPEAKER. The point of order that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] raises is that the article read from the Clerk's desk does not lay the foundation for a question of personal privilege, and the Chair is inclined to think that is correct.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the Speaker hear me for a moment on that?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asked unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] may be allowed to proceed.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Very well. It makes no difference to me.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, to the charge that I am addicted to "the incessant din of the tom-tom," whatever that may mean, I have no serious defense. If I were to deny it and call upon my fellow Members of the House as witnesses it would probably result, on cross-examination, in needlessly incriminating a number of others who have, more or less, innocently yielded to the seductive influence of the newspaper habit—to acquaint the folks at home as to their doings in Washington. Nor do I think a charge of this kind involves a question of personal privilege. It affects principally the vanity of a Member, and I do not intend to enter upon a discussion of that phase of the question.

As a newspaper man, several times a candidate before the people, I have taken my medicine in times of stress, but in every instance I have done the best I could to fight back honorably and in the open. I value publicity as an instrumentality for public good, and am free to admit that I avail myself of it whenever I am fortunate enough to obtain it for the Delaware River, the city of Philadelphia, the intracoastal waterway, or any other cause or community that is deserving of public confidence and support. I do not seek it for personal glory and am growing less inclined to want it as the exactions of public life increase. I think this is true as to most Members of the House who are striving to achieve something for the people they represent, and who are not anxious to increase their personal obligations and responsibilities.

But I do believe the charge in the last paragraph of the statement attributed to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DONOHUE] involves a question of personal privilege "affecting the conduct of a Member," in that, after referring to letters he claims to have obtained from the chairman and members of his committee, giving him a certificate of character, he refers to his "own quiet, unostentatious way," and with evident reference to my official conduct, protests against "such violence done to truth and decency."

The very fact that the gentleman deemed it necessary to fortify himself with letters from the chairman and some of the members of the Rivers and Harbors Committee—a rather unusual and, I would think, undignified proceeding, as it affects the ethics of this great body—to bolster up a claim that he had performed the simple duty of attending his committee meeting, would seem to indicate that if the gentleman did not have some doubt about his own performance of duty, he was, at least, with the unintentional assistance of those whose letters of indorsement he was able to obtain, preparing to raise the issue of "truth and decency" affecting "the conduct of a Member," and which he hastily and impulsively let loose to the newspapers.

Now, Mr. Chairman, with reference to the charge affecting "the truth and decency" of a Member, since it comes to me as the result of the excitement and heated reasoning of my colleague [Mr. DONOHUE], it is due to the House that I should be heard briefly. My first effort in this body after my election in the fall of 1906 was in behalf of the Delaware River, a great commercial river, the improvement of which, in Philadelphia, we believed to have been stood aside for reasons which it is not now necessary to recall. Mr. BURTON, of Ohio, was then chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. I think it will be remembered that I pursued Mr. BURTON persuasively and by argument and dunning for many sessions, and that I was something of a thorn in the side of his immediate successor, Mr. Alexander, of New York, until finally we were given authorization and appropriations for a 35-foot channel for the Delaware, which, when completed, would put us upon an equality with our sister ports of Boston and New York.

Out of this Delaware River agitation, it will also be remembered, was born the Atlantic coastal project, contemplating a continuous inland waterway from New England to Florida, upon which, after long and persistent agitation, we have just obtained a report from the United States engineers. It will be conceded that I have devoted much time to the promotion of this project and have beaten a few "tom-toms," whatever they are, along the coast and in this House with regard to it. As to the "truth and decency" of this statement, I invite an inspection of the records of the House. At the same time I invite the closest scrutiny of the record of my colleague [Mr. DONOHUE] since he has been a Member of the House as to any aid or assistance he has given to either of these projects.

So much in a general way for my record on the Delaware River and other waterways, as it is affected by the gentleman's charge as to "truth and decency."

Now, as to the incident which induced him to seek the cover of his chairman and fellow committee members to attack me. I am not a member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, but presume I am as familiar to the members of that committee as most of the Members of this House. I understand the pressure that is brought upon the chairman and members of the committee by those interested in local projects, and when it comes to the framing of a bill I do not wonder that the chairman and members of the committee get tired and restive and seek the seclusion of secret meetings. It is perhaps the only way in which they can get their bill in shape. The trouble which seems to have agitated my colleague [Mr. DONOHUE] arises from the fact that when these meetings began he was upon the inside and I was upon the outside.

My interest was in the Delaware River. I wanted that work protected in committee. I had spoken to the chairman and to other Members about it and understood my colleague was protecting our interests. It was because I thought so that I did not ask for a formal hearing.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the report of the Chief of Engineers approving the Delaware River 35-foot project, dated March 2, 1910, was based upon the report of the district engineer, who, after a survey—after carefully going over the whole project—suggested that the work should be completed within a period of six years. That portion of the report of the district engineer indorsed by the Board of Engineers, approved by the Chief of Engineers, reported to this House, and indorsed in the bill brought in by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, was as follows:

Taking into consideration the results of the survey, the needs of the navy yard, the possible increase in the size of ships before the improvement can be completed, and the present and prospective importance of Philadelphia, I am of the opinion that the Federal Government is justified in undertaking the improvement of the Delaware River with a view to securing a channel 35 feet in depth, 800 feet wide in straight portions, 1,000 feet wide at the easier turns, and 1,200 feet wide at the worst turn at Bulkhead Bar. The estimated cost of this channel is $10,920,000 for original work and $300,000 per year for maintenance. With proper appropriations the work should require for completion about six years. The large amount of excavation required should be done by contract if reasonable prices can be obtained; otherwise it should be done by Government plant.

Approving the report of the district engineer, the Chief of Engineers said:

These reports have been considered by the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, which has held a public hearing in Philadelphia, and in its report dated March 1, 1910, the board states that the channel dimensions of the present project are insufficient to meet the demands of the growing commerce of Philadelphia and vicinity. Believing that the depth of 35 feet now proposed will be utilized by the time it can be made available, and that the commercial navigation interests involved are sufficient to justify improvement to that depth, the board recommends the improvement as proposed.

Conceding the urgency of the work, Mr. Speaker, it would take at least $1,700,000 per annum to keep up with the recommendations of the report of the Army engineers. We have had to struggle to get recognition for the Delaware River, but that report was approved and Congress passed an act, approved June 25, 1910, which not only indorsed the report of the engineers and gave specific recognition to the improvement contemplated, but appropriated $800,000—and this before my colleague arrived.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to have those facts borne in mind. At the rate of $800,000 per annum we could not comply with the recommendations of the United States Army engineers, and the six years' handicap which other large communities along the Atlantic coast now have against the city of Philadelphia would be increased into a period of 15 or 18 or 20 years before we could expect to compete on equal terms with any one of these large cities.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. BOOHER. I would like to say to the gentleman that the fact that only $800,000 was appropriated last year and $1,000,000 this year does not mean that the project will not be completed in the time limit set in the law. Every dollar was appropriated last year and this year that the Chief of Engineers said he could expend on the project, and next year, if the estimates of the Chief of Engineers require it, you will be doubled or trebled. But the project, as we understand it in the committee, will be completed within the time fixed by law.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But at the rate allowed in the bill as first proposed, to wit, $700,000, we would be 20 years in the completion of that channel, and perhaps we would be thrown back another 10 years.

Mr. BOOHER. The idea was that it should be completed within the time limit set. Next year, perhaps, three times this appropriation will be given if it can be used.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am glad to hear the gentleman say that. The gentleman understands perfectly well, I hope, that I am not finding fault with the committee. The committee and I are on the best of terms. I am only leading up to the causes which induced my colleague [Mr. DONOHUE] to charge that I had made untrue statements or had been unfair toward him as a Member of the House.

Mr. BOOHER. I thought, perhaps, the gentleman was laboring under a misapprehension that because we had only appropriated $1,000,000 for this year no more would be appropriated under the contract next year. The project will be completed in the time fixed in the law.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I was referring to the fact that in 1910 it was estimated that $1,700,000 per annum would be required to complete the work within the time allotted. The first year we got $800,000. In February, 1911, another act was approved which appropriated to this project $900,000 more, which was raised in amount, so far as continuing contracts were concerned, $700,000, making a total of $1,500,000 for that year.

Now, I want the gentlemen who are interested, and whose friendship I desire, to bear that in mind; that we had been raised from $800,000 the first year, when my colleague [Mr. DONOHUE] was not in Congress, to $1,500,000, including continuing contracts, for the second year, when my colleague was not in Congress, and that, therefore, as one who was following this matter closely, I was solicitous about what the committee would do this year.

Mr. BOOHER. The gentleman will bear in mind that I am not entering into the controversy between him and his colleague. I simply wanted the gentleman to understand the facts from the standpoint of the committee.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I understand that thoroughly, and I thank the gentleman for referring to it. A Member of this House has some difficulty in getting access to all the members of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and when the bill is about to be made up the chairman of that committee has about as much pressure brought to bear upon him as any man in this House. He has my sympathy, and he has always had my support, so far as I have been able to give it to him, in the work he has undertaken to do.

My colleague [Mr. DONOHUE] had been placed upon this committee immediately upon his entry into this House last fall. He therefore was in a position to protect the city of Philadelphia, and I believed that he would do so. I had no desire to enter into a dispute or a quarrel with him, and I have no desire to enter into a dispute or a quarrel now. But the fact remains that while we got $1,500,000 last year, we are now, even with Mr. DONOHUE on the committee, to get only $1,000,000, and even this was at first cut to $500,000, plus $200,000 for contracts.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it was clever of our friends upon the other side to put a new man upon this committee to take care of interests that some of us have been watching for years, but that ought not to be a barrier to the right of the rest of us to continue our work; and I as a representative of a district which fronts upon the Delaware River certainly demand the right to continue my interest in that work and to go to the committee as often as I can, or ought to, in order to obtain what I believe to be justice and fair treatment for our great improvement.

Now why did any dispute arise between my colleague and myself? I had spoken to the chairman of the committee and believed our project would be provided for. I had spoken to other members upon the committee and did not desire to bore them upon the subject. I did ask for a hearing upon the question of the interoceanic waterway and obtained a very fair and very courteous hearing, incidentally speaking for the Delaware, and my acknowledgments are due to the individual members of the committee and to the committee as a whole for the courtesy shown me. But my colleague from Philadelphia [Mr. DONOHUE] has been a little touchy, because, even though he is a brand-new man on this committee and has been placed by his party in a position of prominence, I have continued to exercise the same interest in the Delaware that I started with here over five years ago.

It was commonly reported in the newspapers of Philadelphia, and the information did not come from me originally, that we would receive $1,400,000 in this bill for the coming year. My colleague objected to my name being associated with that announcement, and yet, Mr. Speaker, he received most of the headlines and has been continuing to get most of the headlines. I have not pressed the newspapers any harder than he has for publicity for this enterprise and have not been getting so much of it for myself.

When I was informed that we were to receive $1,400,000 in this bill for the coming year I was pleased that we were going to get that much recognition, and so stated.

There seems to have been some dispute as to whether I was entitled to the credit for obtaining that $1,400,000. I never claimed it. It was commonly accepted among the commercial interests and trade bodies of our city, who are concerned about the project, that we would get $1,400,000, and that my colleague [Mr. DONOHUE] would be on the job and see that it was obtained. They were looking to the rest of us. Communications were coming to me, and I certainly was not asleep with regard to my duty in the matter. But on Monday morning last, following preliminary newspaper reports for which I certainly was not responsible with regard to what this committee was going to do—somebody had evidently leaked and given out the secrets of the committee—the Philadelphia Record, a newspaper which has been indorsing my colleague [Mr. DONOHUE] and which is perhaps the best spokesman of the Democratic Party in my State, published this editorial, which I desire to have read from the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HENRY of Texas). The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

MISSISSIPPI "PORK."

In the Record of Saturday there was reprinted from the New Orleans Picayune a portion of an article deploring the almost complete disappearance of the once great commerce of the Mississippi River within the past 30 or 40 years. "To-day," it said, "with the exception of fleets of coal barges from Pittsburgh, far up in Pennsylvania, and a few steamboats bringing sugar and cotton out of the bayou regions of Louisiana and Mississippi, the entire interior river commerce, once so vast in volume, has vanished, absolutely ceased to exist."

This is a particularly interesting statement when placed side by side with the river and harbor bill just completed by the House of Representatives' committee that has charge of that feature of the pork barrel. Of the $25,965,011 which it carries the largest single amount, $5,950,000, goes to the Mississippi River. This is closely followed by $5,400,000 for the Ohio River, $800,000 for the Missouri River, $350,000 for the Tennessee River, and $100,000 for the Ouachita and Black Rivers, in Arkansas and Louisiana. Of the total amount which it is proposed to appropriate for the rivers and harbors of the entire country it will be thus seen that the streams of the Mississippi Valley, from which, according to the New Orleans paper, water commerce has almost completely vanished, are to receive $12,600,000, or about 48.5 per cent.

Compare this with the $700,000 set aside for the Delaware River. The foreign commerce of Philadelphia amounted last year to about $150,000,000 in the value of exports and imports, and the domestic and coastwise traffic, of which no statistical account is kept, was, it may safely be said, fully twice as much. Add the river business of Chester, Wilmington, Burlington, and the scores of other towns along the Delaware, and it will be seen that splendid stream carried not less than half a billion dollars' worth of foreign and domestic commerce in 1911. Yet it gets less than the Missouri River, which has absolutely no trade whatever, and all efforts to improve which, in the interest of Kansas City and other interior cities, have proved dismal failures.

It is well known that the very successful efforts to bag appropriations for the Mississippi and the Ohio Rivers are in no manner due to the needs of those streams, whose commerce seems to wane in proportion as Uncle Sam lavishes money upon them, but to a very compact combination of the Congressmen of the States lying in the Mississippi Valley. The expenditures of $12,600,000 of Federal cash within their districts is no slight matter. Army engineers have reported more than once that the dream of a deepened and straightened Mississippi, up which large foreign steamships could make their way to Memphis, St. Louis, and ultimately to Chicago, is the wildest kind of a chimera, impossible of realization; but what is such an argument among those who have their hands in the pork barrel? In the meantime the merits of the Delaware and other streams which really have some commerce are neglected because of a failure among Eastern Congressmen to stand solidly together for the interests of their own territory.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, my colleague is an eastern Congressman. He is on this committee and in a favorable position to do good work for the East, as well as for the whole country. After reading this editorial, it seemed to me to be the part of wisdom to inquire whether we were to be cut down, and whether the bulk of the appropriations were again to go into the western territory for these three great rivers that have been mentioned. So on Monday morning last I called at the rooms of the Rivers and Harbors Committee with a view of seeing the chairman. The chairman was busy. I conferred with the clerk of the committee and ascertained that the appropriation for the Delaware River, which we had expected to be $1,400,000, was not to be $1,400,000, but was to be $500,000, plus $200,000, for which we might enter into contracts. Our expectation that we were going to get $1,400,000 was blighted; we had been cut in half; that half to include maintenance also. This fact led me to say to the clerk of the committee, in order that he might say it to the chairman, that if we were to be cut to that extent, despite the fact that my colleague was upon the committee, those of us who were interested in the continuance of this work and in seeing that money spent upon it would not go to waste, and that we should get somewhere within the time fixed by the engineers, would protest, and I said it would lead to a protest on the floor, perhaps, when the bill came up in the House. The sum of $2,000,000 having been recommended by the engineers for the ensuing year, and we having expected $1,400,000, and it being proposed to appropriate only $500,000, plus $200,000, I said we could not submit without protest, for it would mean waste and delay on a great work begun and not completed. Subsequently, I was informed, the Rivers and Harbors Committee met in executive session.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have no means of knowing what transpired in the committee meeting, but I do know that before the committee meeting was held on Monday I saw the advance sheets of the committee report in which it was provided that the Delaware River should receive $500,000, plus $200,000. That meant a loss of at least one-half of the sum that had been confidently expected. At the subsequent meeting of the committee I was not present. The statement of my colleague is perfectly true in that respect. It was a secret meeting of the committee in which I had no right, and it was for shaping up its report. I have been informed, and I give him full credit, that my colleague did urge at this meeting that the appropriation be raised from $500,000, plus $200,000, to a higher sum, and that the committee did finally fix $1,000,000 as the amount of the appropriation for the Delaware River, or $500,000 less than we got last year.

That afternoon, with my heels cooling outside the door of the committee room, I was admitted upon adjournment, and I went, as every Member of Congress has a right to do and ought to do under such circumstances, to the chairman of the committee and those still assembled in the room and was advised that the change had been made, and that instead of receiving $700,000 we were to get $1,000,000, but how we were to get it I was not informed.

Now, I make this statement merely as a matter of justice to myself, in view of the charge that my methods in the matter have been unfair to my colleague [Mr. DONOHUE]. I want to give him all the credit that can come to him for the work he can do or will do for the Delaware River, for the city of Philadelphia, or for the State of Pennsylvania. I think it is the duty of every man in the House to give full credit to every other Member for the work that he does. I have seen cases where credit has not been given to the man who originated and pushed the work; where jealousy and envy have robbed the rightful man of the credit that he ought to receive. I have no envy for any man who accomplishes something, but am ever ready to give him earnest praise for his work in the House; and if any Member of the Pennsylvania delegation, or any other delegation, makes himself conspicuous in his work for the benefit of his constituency and the country, I will applaud him, no matter whether he is on this side or the other side of the House. [Applause.] But I repeat that when we were given reason to believe that we would get $1,400,000 to continue an absolutely necessary work and prevent waste on the Delaware project, and found by reason of conditions that gave a tremor even to the Record of Philadelphia, the greatest Democratic newspaper of our State, and found we were to be cut in two, I was doing no more than my duty in calling public attention to it, and since my colleague got busy, after I had sounded the alarm, and induced the committee to raise the appropriation to $1,000,000, there is no reason why he should not be given the credit he covets. [Applause.]

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I have taken the floor at the conclusion of the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] because of the absence of my colleague, Mr.

DONOHUE. I am not very familiar with the proceedings before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors which have resulted in some appropriation for the improvement of the Delaware River, and I do not propose to discuss the merits of that proposition. I want simply to say that this whole matter arises out of the fact that there has been considerable friendly and political rivalry between the partisans of the gentleman from Philadelphia, Mr. MOORE, and the gentleman from Philadelphia, Mr. DONOHUE, in the Philadelphia newspapers as to which of these two gentlemen is entitled to the greater credit for the final recognition of the great Delaware River.

Up to the time that this Congress met, Mr. Speaker, the publicity agents of some Members of this House had been so actively at work that the public in Philadelphia, judging from the newspaper dispatches sent out from Washington, had been taught to believe that the Congress of the United States consisted exclusively of Mr. Speaker CANNON and Mr. J. HAMPTON MOORE. [Laughter and applause.]

In the Sixty-first Congress the gentleman from Philadelphia, Mr. MOORE, was a candidate for a position on the Rivers and Harbors Committee, where he believed he could be of service to his city. He had been a candidate for that place in the Congress before that and in the first Congress of which he became a Member. The Speaker of the House and the Republican majority of this House refused to recognize the interests of the great city of Philadelphia and its needs and refused to place him on that committee.

He takes umbrage now that a new Member is placed upon that committee in this Congress, yet in the Sixty-first Congress the Speaker put upon the Rivers and Harbors Committee as a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania a man who had never seen service in this House, who was a brand new Member, the gentleman from Washington County, Mr. Tener, and passed over the demands of the gentleman from Philadelphia that he and his great city should be recognized upon that committee. The Republican Party refused consistently to do anything for Philadelphia, or for Mr. MOORE if he were anxious and earnest in his desires to improve the waters in that section of the State, and the whole trouble comes about from this, that when the city of Philadelphia, in part, woke up and broke from the political shackles which had bound it for generations [applause on the Democratic side] and sent to this House a Democrat, the city of Philadelphia, with its legitimate desires and needs, was recognized by this House [applause on the Democratic side], and a Democrat was put in a place where he could be of service to his people and his State, a recognition which had been denied the city by a Republican majority in previous Congresses. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I mention these things to lead up to this proposition, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. All that the gentleman has said does not deprive me as an humble Member of the minority and still a representative from Philadelphia from doing the best I can for the Delaware River, does it?

Mr. PALMER. No; the gentleman is doing the best he can, but I want to assure him that his best is not a farthing compared with the best of the gentleman from Philadelphia Mr. DONOHUE. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman think, when the appropriation was cut—

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. PALMER. I ask for two minutes.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Take five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Reserving the right to object, I would like the gentleman to answer one or two questions.

Mr. PALMER. I will answer the questions of the gentleman. I did not object when he took the floor to enter upon a long tirade against Mr. DONOHUE.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I made no tirade against Mr. DONOHUE. I tried to give him all the credit I could for coming in after the appropriation had been cut and doing his best to restore it. Will not the gentleman admit, since he has brought politics into this discussion, that the gentleman himself is entitled to a bouquet which should be made even of lilies of the valley for having, immediately upon the introduction of Mr. DONOHUE into this House, placed him upon that committee, where he might bask in the sunshine of the records his predecessors made for the Delaware River?

Mr. PALMER. Well, Mr. Speaker, I did not place Mr. DONOHUE upon the Committee on Rivers and Harbors—

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Did not the gentleman see the advantage of his being there—

Mr. PALMER (continuing). He was placed there by the majority of this House, and was elected by this House to that place. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But the gentleman could see—

Mr. PALMER. One moment—and neither is it true that he is basking in the sunshine of the efforts made by his predecessors in this House. He started work anew, and regardless of errors and mistakes made by his predecessors in this House and regardless of discriminations made by the Republican Party in this House against the Delaware River, he went about his work and has accomplished something worth while for Philadelphia and Pennsylvania [applause on the Democratic side], more than the gentleman from Philadelphia and his entire delegation have ever in the past been able to accomplish. Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman says—

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania further yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. PALMER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have always paid tribute to the gentleman for his ability, and I want him to answer this question.

Mr. PALMER. We are not talking about myself—

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I know, but there are some things I want to talk about.

Is it not true that the gentleman himself, coming on to be the leader of Democracy in his State, suggested the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DONOHUE] for appointment on this committee in view of the circumstances he has just described?

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, there is no politics, as far as we are concerned on this side of the House, in the Rivers and Harbors Committee.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But the gentleman will not answer.

Mr. PALMER. And the attempt to inject politics into this proposition has been made by the gentleman who last spoke. In Philadelphia he has made this a burning political issue, and he has had his newspapers defending him—

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. PALMER (continuing). When the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DONOHUE] has been given real credit by those newspapers for his honest work. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman answer this question? I put it to him fairly and frankly: Did not the gentleman from Pennsylvania who is now addressing the House, in view of the known conditions existing in Philadelphia and Pennsylvania, seeing the advantage that it would be to him from a party sense, suggest Mr. DONOHUE for appointment on this committee, and by reason of that fact have we not heard of Mr. DONOHUE's interest in the Delaware River, concerning which we had never heard before?

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, not for party advantage, not for the purpose of giving the Democratic Party credit, but for the purpose of giving Philadelphia and Pennsylvania the recognition which your party had denied them was the reason that I supported Mr. DONOHUE for a place on the Rivers and Harbors Committee. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman assert that there was any lack of interest on the part of the other Republican Members and this particular "gentleman from Pennsylvania" in advocating waterway projects in the East?

Mr. PALMER. There was apparent interest on the part of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] and much advertisement in the Philadelphia newspapers concerning his efforts in the direction, but small real results. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the time of the gentleman be extended for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] asks unanimous consent that the time of his colleague be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman answer this: Is it not a fact that when the 35-foot-channel appropriation question was approved that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DONOHUE] was not a Member of the House? Will not the gentleman answer that?

Mr. PALMER. That may be true.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is true?

Mr. PALMER. Certainly we do not claim any credit for the gentleman [Mr. DONOHUE] for things which were done before he became a Member of the House.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. You are doing it now.

Mr. PALMER. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] in the Philadelphia newspapers—

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will admit that I am working for the interests of my city. I admit it.

Mr. PALMER (continuing). Is taking credit to himself for what the other gentleman from Philadelphia has done. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not deny getting all the help I can. I ask the gentleman to yield in order to answer a question.

Mr. PALMER. I yield to the gentleman for the purpose of asking the question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. When the act of June 25, 1910, was passed, putting the 35-foot project into legislative form and appropriating $800,000 for that purpose, when I was a Member of the House, was the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DONOHUE] a Member of the House?

Mr. PALMER. That is a question of history which the Congressional Directory will answer.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. One more question. The gentleman has answered my other question so cleverly, so directly, and so frankly that I would like to ask one more. When the act of February 27, 1911, was passed did Mr. DONOHUE get any of the appropriation for $700,000 plus $800,000, a total of $1,500,000, the $700,000 being put in on the Senate side, and for which certain newspapers of Philadelphia are giving Mr. DONOHUE credit? Was he here then?

Mr. PALMER. He was not a Member of the House until the 4th of March, 1911. His service has been short, and while I would not rob the gentleman from Philadelphia Mr. MOORE—

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I thank you for conceding that—

Mr. PALMER. Or the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], at the other end of the Capitol, who have done what they could or what they would for the River Delaware and the city of Philadelphia, I am objecting to the gentleman from Philadelphia Mr. MOORE attempting to rob his present colleague Mr. DONOHUE—

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I give him credit for all he has done—

Mr. PALMER. Of credit belonging to him for the great service he has rendered to his city and State since he has been a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] must address the Chair if he desires to interrupt a gentleman speaking on the floor.

Mr. PALMER. I want to add only this, Mr. Speaker: That if the good people of Philadelphia elsewhere will follow the example of those who reside in the district of the gentleman from Philadelphia Mr. DONOHUE, and if the good people of Pennsylvania outside the city of Philadelphia shall also follow that example, they will place upon the floor of this House men who will be able by their service here to bring results to their city and to their State such as have not been secured while the gentleman from Philadelphia Mr. MOORE and his colleagues have sat on that side of the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. CANNON rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois rise?

Mr. CANNON. I would like to have unanimous consent to speak for five minutes, inasmuch as my name has been dragged into this debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] asks unanimous consent to be allowed to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to address the House briefly, because, though only incidentally, I am involved in this controversy on account of the organization of the Sixty-first Congress.

I recollect very well the designation of the membership upon committees, which under the rules of the House is always subject to approval and change by the House if they disagree. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] It always has been so, as a matter of high privilege, after the committees have been designated. I did designate the members for service on the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] was anxious to be a member of that committee. The senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] was a member of the Committee on Commerce of the Senate, having jurisdiction over the subject of rivers and harbors in that body. Pennsylvania is a great State, abutting on the Atlantic coast, its confines reaching out to the Ohio River. This is a large country, and it seemed to me, in designating the membership of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, that Philadelphia was represented in the Senate and that the Middle West and the Mississippi River and the Ohio and the tributaries of the Mississippi were entitled to representation. Therefore, notwithstanding my great respect for the gentleman representing the Philadelphia district [Mr. MOORE], I designated a man in the western end of the State for membership on that committee. I have no apologies to make therefor, and it is not to the discredit of my friend, politically and personally [Mr. MOORE], that he was not designated.

May I say a word further? The majority is always responsible, and while the Speaker organized the committees without objection in the Sixty-first Congress, yet in the Sixty-second Congress the Ways and Means majority, then not yet appointed, organized the House—the present House—and so organized it that its plan of organization had legs enough to receive the approval of the Democratic caucus. CZAR CANNON! Yet CZAR UNDERWOOD and my friend, in whose eye I look, CZAR PALMER, made the organization. [Applause and laughter.]

Gentlemen, that was your right. I am throwing no clubs at you for doing it.

By the by, I notice that the great Commonwealth of Pennsylvania has always been represented under all conditions, and well represented. [Applause.] The Delaware River, with a 30-foot channel, and then a 35-foot channel, has been treated with fair liberality, along with the balance of the country; and, so far as my friend and colleague Mr. MOORE is concerned, I want to say that in former Congresses and in this, in my judgment, he has been quite second to no other Member of this House touching appropriations by his industry and ability. [Applause on the Republican side.] I have not the pleasure of the acquaintance of the Democratic Member from Philadelphia [Mr. DONOHUE], but I will venture the prediction and express the hope, notwithstanding his admirable personality as it has been portrayed by my friend in church and state, who sits on the other side of the House [Mr. PALMER], that when the ides of November come the places that know them now will know them no more in this House. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PALMER. The gentleman should not be too sure about that. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

INJUNCTION LEGISLATION.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of injunction legislation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of injunctions. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I desire to lay before the House for its information a statement of law on the subject of injunctions, given to me by Mr. Andrew Furuseth:

GOVERNMENT BY INJUNCTION—THE MISUSE OF THE EQUITY POWER.

The modern use of the writ of injunction, especially in labor disputes, is revolutionary and destructive of popular government.

Our Government was designed to be a government by law, said law to be enacted by the legislative branch, construed by the judiciary, and administered by the executive.

An injunction is "an extraordinary writ issued out of equity enjoining a threatened injury to property or property rights where there is not a plain, adequate, and complete remedy at law."

The definition of equity is "the application of right and justice to the legal adjustment of differences where the law by reason of its universality is deficient," or "that system of jurisprudence which comprehends every matter of law for which the common law provides no remedy . . . springing originally from the royal prerogative, moderating the harshness of the common law according to good conscience." In other words, it is the exercise of power according to the judgment and conscience of one man.

It was for this reason that in Great Britain, whence the United States derives its system of equity as well as of law, the equity power was limited to the protection of property or property rights, and in such cases only where there was no remedy at law; the words adequate and complete have been added here.

When the courts of equity take jurisdiction over and issue injunctions in labor disputes they do so to protect business, which, under late rulings by several courts, is held to be property. These rulings are disputed and condemned by other courts, which hold that relations between employers and employees—between buyer and seller—are personal relations, and as such, if regulated at all, are regulated by statute or common law only. If the latter contention be right, and of this we believe there can be no question, the ruling that makes business property, or the right to carry on or continue in business a property right, is revolutionary, and must lead to a complete change, not only in our industrial but in our political life. If the court of equity be permitted to regulate personal relations, it will gradually draw to itself all legislative power. If it be permitted to set aside or to enforce law, it will ultimately ar-rogate to itself jurisdiction now held by the law courts and abolish trial by jury.

The Constitution confers equity power upon the courts by stating that they shall have jurisdiction in law and in equity in the same way that it makes it their duty to issue the writ of habeas corpus, and in substantially the same way as it provides for trial by jury. Equity power came to us as it existed in England at the time of the adoption of our Constitution, and it was so limited and defined by English authorities that our courts could not obtain jurisdiction in labor disputes except by the adoption of a rule that business is property. If business be property in the case of a strike or boycott, and can therefore be protected by the equity court against diminution of its usual income caused by a strike or boycott conducted by the working people, then it necessarily must be property at other times, and therefore entitled to be protected against loss of income caused by competition from other manufacturers or business men. Business and the income from business would become territorial and would be in the same position as land and the income from land. The result would be to make all competition in trade unlawful; it would prevent anyone from engaging in trade or manufacture unless he comply with the whims and fancies of those who have their trade or means of production already established.

No one could enter into business except through inheritance, bequest, or sale.

In order to show the fallacy of this new definition of property, we here state the accepted legal definitions of property, business, and labor.

Definition of property: "Property means the dominion of indefinite right of user and disposition which one lawfully exercises over particular things or subjects, and generally to the exclusion of all others. Property is ownership; the exclusive right of any person freely to use, enjoy and dispose of any determinate object, whether real or personal." (English and American Encyclopedia of Law.)

"Property is the exclusive right of possessing, enjoying, and disposing of a thing." (Century Dictionary.)

"A right imparting to the owner a power of indefinite user, capable of being transmitted to universal successors by way of descent, and imparting to the owner the power of disposition from himself and his successors." (Austin, Jurisprudence.)

"The sole and despotic dominion which one claims and exercises over the external things of the world in total exclusion of the right of any other individual in the world." (Blackstone.)

It will be seen that property is products of nature or of labor, and that the essential element is that it may be disposed of by sale, be given away, or in any other way transferred to another.

There is no distinction in law between property and property rights. From these definitions it is plain that labor power or patronage can not be property, but aside from this we have the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution prohibiting slavery and involuntary servitude.

Labor power can not be property, because it can not be separated from the laborer. It is personal. It grows with health, diminishes in sickness, and ceases at death. It is an attribute of life.

The ruling of the courts make of the laborer a serf, of patronage an evidence of servitude by assuming that one may have a property right in the labor or patronage of another.

Definition of business: That which occupies the time, attention, and labor of men for the purpose of livelihood or profit; that which occupies the time, attention, and labor of men for the purpose of profit and improvement. (American and English Encycl. of Law.)

That which busies, or that which occupies the time, attention, or labor of one, as his principal concern, whether for a longer or shorter time. (Webster's Dictionary.)

Definition of labor: Physical or mental effort, particularly for some useful or desired end. Exertion of the powers for some end other than recreation or sport. (Century Dictionary.)

It will be seen from the above definition that while there is a fundamental difference between property and business, there is none at all between business and labor, so that if business be property, so is labor, and if the earning power of business can be protected by equity power through injunction, so can the earning power of labor; in other words, the laborer may obtain an injunction against a reduction of his wages, or against a discharge, which would stop the wages entirely.

If this new definition of property, by including therein business and labor, be accepted, then the judge sitting in equity becomes the irresponsible master of all men who do business or who labor.

We contend that equity power and jurisdiction—discretionary government by the judiciary—for well-defined purposes and within specific limitations granted to the courts by the Constitution, has been so extended that it is invading the field of government by law and endangering constitutional liberty; that is, the personal liberty of the individual citizen.

As government by equity—personal government—advances, republican government—government by law—recedes.

We have escaped from despotic government by the King. We realized that, after all, he was but a man. Are we going to permit the growing up of a despotic government by the judges? Are not they also men?

The despotism of one can in this sense be no better than the despotism of another. If we are to preserve "government of the people, by the people, and for the people," any usurpation by the judiciary must be as sternly resisted as usurpation by the Executive.

What labor is seeking is the assistance of all liberty-loving men in restoring the common-law definition of property and in restricting the jurisdiction of the equity courts in that connection to what it was at the time of the adoption of the Constitution.

A bill has been, and now is, before Congress for his purpose. We ask your careful consideration of the reasons for this bill and of the bill itself, and your assistance in inducing Congress to make it law.

NAVIGATION LAWS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask immediate consideration for the privileged resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 365.

Resolved, That there be printed and bound in cloth, for the use of the House of Representatives, 1,000 copies of the Navigation Laws of the United States, edition 1911, issued by the Bureau of Navigation of the Department of Commerce and Labor.

Mr. FINLEY. I ask that the Clerk read the report (H. Rept. 375).

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Printing, having had under consideration the House resolution (H. Res. 365) providing for the printing of the Navigation

Laws of the United States, reports the same back to the House with the recommendation that the resolution be agreed to.
The estimated cost will be $459.95.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FINLEY. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Is this an annual resolution?

Mr. FINLEY. I can not say that it is. I can only say that the supply is exhausted, and that these copies are needed.

Mr. GARNER. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. FINLEY. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Will these copies, when they are bound, go to the document room or to the folding room to the credit of Members?

Mr. FINLEY. They will go to the folding room to the credit of Members.

Mr. MANN. And there most of them will be unused and useless.

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think they will not be useless, and I think they will be used. There has been a very insistent demand for these publications, and there is a very good reason for the passage of the resolution at this time.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman did not understand the remark that I made.

Mr. GARNER. If the gentleman from South Carolina will permit me, I made this inquiry for the purpose of ascertaining where these documents would go and how many each Member of Congress would have. Under this resolution the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] would have about two copies to his credit; so if he had a great deal of call for them, I imagine he would have to go and beg his colleagues to let him have a few of them to send to his constituents. Why not let these go to the folding room, where the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], who has a great many calls for them, can get them and send them to his constituents? The gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Illinois may never have any call for them.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman from South Carolina yield to me?

Mr. FINLEY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not care very much how these are distributed, if we can get them. I want to say that there is a positive demand for these navigation laws. The Department of Commerce and Labor has a very heavy demand. The Bureau of Navigation can not comply with the requests which come for them, and during the coming year there will be an international congress of navigation held for the first time in the United States, with delegates coming from all over the world—probably 400 or 500 of them. The officers of that convention, who are Government officials, have asked that they be given some of these copies in order that they may present them to these foreigners.

Foreigners are anxious to know what the navigation laws of the United States are. All along the coast there is a demand for them, shipping is increasing along the Atlantic seaboard, and people want to know what the laws are.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FINLEY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. This provides for printing 1,000 copies. That would be 2 to each Member, and the odd number of 200 or more would go to the document room of the Public Printer for sale. Is there a demand there for them, or are they out of them at that office?

Mr. FINLEY. I can not answer as to what the demand is there. I can only say that I do not think any copies will be wasted or not be called for. There is a demand for this publication. I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate concurrent resolution 11.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 10,000 additional copies of the Message of the President of the United States transmitting the report of the Employers' Liability and Workmen's Compensation Commission, together with the hearings held before the commission, of which 2,500 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 5,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 2,500 copies for the use of the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate; and

That there be printed as a Senate document, in one pamphlet, 25,000 copies of the message and report only, of which 5,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 12,500 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 7,500 copies for the use of the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate.

The Clerk read the following report (No. 374) of the committee:

The Committee on Printing having had under consideration the Senate concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 11) providing for the printing of the hearings before, and the report of, the Employers' Liability and Workmen's Compensation Commission, reports the same back to the House with the recommendation that the resolution be agreed to.

The estimated (approximate) cost will be $8,406.45.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FINLEY. I will.

Mr. MANN. I see that the resolution provides for the printing of an equal number of these reports for the use of the House and the use of the Senate, including the Senate committee that has jurisdiction. It is not exactly in that form, but that is the effect of it. Why should we provide for printing 7,500 documents for the use of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate and not any for the use of the Judiciary Committee of the House?

Mr. FINLEY. I will inform the gentleman. This work was done by a joint commission of the House and Senate. That commission is out of commission. They had many thousand requests for this publication. Now, it is intended by this provision in the resolution that the Senate Committee on the Judiciary shall fill the requests that have come to this joint commission.

Mr. MANN. The purpose is to turn over practically that number to Senator SUTHERLAND, chairman of that commission, to fill the requests that have been made of the commission?

Mr. FINLEY. Yes; and to other members.

Mr. MANN. Turn them over to them for the purpose of filling requests that have been made on the commission?

Mr. FINLEY. That is substantially true.

Mr. MANN. Is that satisfactory to the House members of the commission?

Mr. FINLEY. It is. I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOON], a member of the commission.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I have anything to say on the subject, except that I regard it as of the utmost importance that this publication should be made and made promptly. A great inquiry has arisen throughout the country and a great many requests have been presented to me as a member of the commission for the publication of this report. I would like to ask the chairman of the Printing Committee a question.

Mr. FINLEY. I will yield.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. I have not seen the report or the resolution. May I ask whether it is intended to publish any of the hearings?

Mr. FINLEY. The report of the House Committee on Printing recommends that the Senate resolution pass without amendment.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Does it provide for the publication of the hearings?

Mr. FINLEY. Yes; 10,000 additional copies of the message, together with the hearings held before the commission.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. It seems to me that it ought to be amended to include the report of the commission.

Mr. FINLEY. If the gentleman will read the resolution—I was under the impression that he was familiar with it.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. No; I have not seen it; but it seems to me most important that the report of the commission should be published. The commission spent a great deal of time upon it, and we have summarized both the law and the facts. It seems to me that there would be few people who would be interested in the hearings alone.

Mr. FINLEY. There is ample provision for the printing of the report.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. I see there is a provision to print 25,000 copies of the report. I trust the House will pass this, as there is a very great demand for it.

The question was taken, and the concurrent resolution was agreed to.

DECISION, SUPREME COURT, RAILROAD EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY ACT.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the present consideration of the privileged resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 383.

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House of Representatives 15,000 copies of the opinion and order of the Supreme Court of the United States, delivered January 15, 1912, at Nos. 120, 170, 289, and 290, October term, 1911, known as the opinion of the Supreme Court on the "Act of Congress relating to the liability of common carriers by railroad to their employees in certain cases," to be distributed through the document room of the House of Representatives.

The report of the committee was read, as follows:

Report No. 372 to accompany House resolution 383.

The Committee on Printing having had under consideration the House resolution (H. Res. 383) providing for the printing of 15,000 copies of the opinion of the Supreme Court on railroad employers' liability act, reports the same back to the House with the recommendation that the resolution be agreed to.

The estimated cost will be $120.26.

Mr. MANN. How many is it proposed by the resolution to print?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from South Carolina yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. FINLEY. I do.

Mr. MANN. I did not hear the number.

Mr. FINLEY. Fifteen thousand, and I will state that this is a very important decision of the Supreme Court. It relates the law as to fellow servants.

Mr. MANN. It sustains the law we passed?

Mr. FINLEY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. After the Judiciary Committee had two whacks at it they succeeded finally in getting a law that was constitutional?

Mr. FINLEY. Yes.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

PUBLIC HEALTH BULLETIN NO. 48.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the immediate consideration of the privileged resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 393.

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House document room 16,000 copies of Public Health Bulletin No. 48, on pellagra, prepared by Passed Asst. Surg. C. H. Lavinder.

The report was read, as follows:

Report No. 373 to accompany House resolution 393.

The Committee on Printing having had under consideration the House resolution (H. Res. 393) providing for the printing of Public Health Bulletin No. 48, reports the same back to the House with the recommendation that the resolution be agreed to. The estimated cost will be $469.28.

Mr. MANN. What is the number?

Mr. FINLEY. Sixteen thousand copies.

Mr. MANN. That is the bulletin of the Public Health Service?

Mr. FINLEY. It is, and a very valuable one.

Mr. MANN. They have published a bulletin recently in regard to typhoid; has the gentleman any request to have that printed?

Mr. FINLEY. I think there is one, but I have not it on my desk.

Mr. MANN. It ought to be printed in large numbers.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

REPORT OF NATIONAL MONETARY COMMISSION.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask the immediate consideration of the following privileged resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution 28.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed, for the use of the House of Representatives, 30,000 copies of the report, with accompanying bill, of the National Monetary Commission, to be delivered to the superintendent of the folding room of the House of Representatives for distribution.

The report was read, as follows:

Report No. 376 to accompany House concurrent resolution 28.

The Committee on Printing, having had under consideration the House concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 28) providing for the printing of 30,000 copies of the report of the National Monetary Commission, reports the same back to the House with the recommendation that the resolution be agreed to.

The estimated cost will be $604.94.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee—

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. FINLEY. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. This is simply to print the report?

Mr. FINLEY. Yes. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT].

Mr. BARTLETT. Is it simply the report?

Mr. PADGETT. A part of the report and the suggested bill that accompanies it. It does not reprint all of it. That would cost many thousands of dollars. This is the report of the commission.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the House concurrent resolution.

The question was taken, and the House concurrent resolution was agreed to.

FERTILIZER RESOURCES OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the immediate consideration of the House concurrent resolution No. 40, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution 40.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 10,000 copies of Senate Document No. 190, "Fertilizer Resources of the United States," message from the President of the United States, December 18, 1911, for the use of the House.

The report (No. 377) was read, as follows:

Mr. FINLEY, from the Committee on Printing, makes the following report, to accompany House concurrent resolution 40:

The Committee on Printing, having had under consideration the House concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 40) providing for the printing of 10,000 copies of Senate Document No. 190, reports the same back to the House, with the recommendation that the resolution be agreed to. The estimated cost will be $1,669.26.

Mr. FINLEY. In the last agricultural appropriation bill there was appropriated $12,000, as I remember, to make an investigation for the purpose, if possible, of finding a potash supply somewhere in the United States, and this document gives that information. I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the House concurrent resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

MILEAGE AND COST OF PUBLIC ROADS.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the immediate consideration of House resolution No. 400, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 400.

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House document room 11,750 copies of Public Roads Bulletin No. 41, Mileage and Cost of Public Roads in the United States in 1909.

The following report (No. 378) was read:

Mr. FINLEY, from the Committee on Printing, makes the following report to accompany House resolution 400:

The Committee on Printing, having had under consideration the House resolution (H. Res. 400) providing for the printing of 11,750 copies of Public Roads Bulletin No. 41, Mileage and Cost of Public Roads in the United States in 1909, reports the same back to the House with the recommendation that the resolution be agreed to.

The estimated cost will be $488.98.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

EXCHANGE OF CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of Senate concurrent resolution No. 14, and I will state that this is a mere matter of comity—

Mr. MANN. Let us hear it read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate concurrent resolution 14.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of State is hereby authorized to furnish a copy of the daily and bound CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to the Under Secretary of State for External Affairs of Canada, in exchange for a copy of the Parliamentary Hansard; and that the Public Printer is hereby directed to honor the requisition of the Secretary of State for such copy.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, is this a concurrent resolution?

Mr. FINLEY. It is.

Mr. MANN. It is designed to make permanent law?

Mr. FINLEY. To exchange similar publications between this country and Canada.

Mr. MANN. With all due respect to the distinguished body at the other end of the Capitol and to the Committee on Printing of the House, I think everyone who thinks of it is familiar with the fact that a concurrent resolution can not make permanent law, and has no effect after the life of the Congress that passes it.

It may be construed by the State Department as a direction, and I have no objection to it; but I would have supposed that whoever presented the resolution would have been familiar enough with the distinction between a joint resolution and a concurrent resolution to have prepared a proper resolution on the subject.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I will only say that the House Committee on Printing took the resolution as it came from the Senate. They were very anxious to have it passed, and we have no objection to it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the concurrent resolution?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman from South Carolina that he can amend his concurrent resolution and make a joint resolution out of it, and let the Senate concur in his amendment.

Mr. FINLEY. Then, Mr. Speaker, I will ask leave to withdraw the resolution for the present, if the Speaker will indulge me.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] withdraws his resolution for the present.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVES ALEXANDER C. MITCHELL AND EDMOND H. MADISON.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Sunday, April 14, be set apart under special order for eulogies of the late ALEXANDER C. MITCHELL, of the second district of Kansas, and of the late EDMOND H. MADISON, of the seventh district of Kansas, late Members of this House. I move that that day be set aside for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] asks unanimous consent that Sunday, April 14, be set aside for eulogies of the late Mr. MITCHELL and the late Mr. MADISON, both of Kansas. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PRINTING OF DOCUMENTS.

Mr. BARNHART rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BARNHART. To ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I want to say just a word concerning some of these printing bills upon which the committee has acted. As a member of that committee I have agreed with the majority in reporting certain bills or resolutions for the printing of documents which in their nature are extravagant and in some respects useless.

I want to call particular attention to the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], which has already been passed by the House, and I do so for the purpose of giving notice that hereafter, regardless of which side of the House these resolutions may come from, I shall protest against the passage of a resolution which on its face is an extravagance from any reasonable standpoint. The gentleman from Illinois introduced a resolution in which he asked for the publication of 20,000 copies of the President's message carrying the report of the Tariff Commission on Schedule K. The cost of that publication will aggregate something like $13,000. I made a general canvass among Members on both sides of the House to ascertain, if possible, what the demands were for this document, and the largest demand I heard of was that of my friend from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], who stated that he thought he could use 100 copies, inasmuch as he represented one of the principal woolgrowing districts of Ohio. Many other Members said they had no requests for this document. Some said they had one request, others more. Even the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] indicated that he had as yet had comparatively few requests for the publication.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. In just a moment. I am perfectly willing to concede the propriety of granting leave for the publication of any document in which the public is interested in such numbers as will probably be used, but I am opposed to the practice that prevails of directing the Public Printer to print an enormous amount of these publications, with the result that the storerooms are glutted with all sorts of documents that are seldom sent out. Now I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. I thought the gentleman was referring to me a moment ago, and unintentionally, I think, he was misquoting me.

Mr. BARNHART. I did not quote the gentleman. I simply said it was my inference of the gentleman's observation.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I would state that I have received several requests for that report.

Mr. BARNHART. Relating to what?

Mr. HAUGEN. The Tariff Board report.

Mr. BARNHART. For how many?

Mr. HAUGEN. For at least a dozen.

Mr. BARNHART. The resolution as it passed provides, I think, an average of 40 copies for each Member of the House and more for Senators.

Mr. HAUGEN. I wish to state that few requests have been made at the document room, but I have personally received several requests.

Mr. WILLIS. Does not the gentleman think that that is a document which, if available, would be much more largely called for? The idea has gone out in the country that it can not be obtained. Since I have talked with the gentleman from Indiana, I will say that I have received requests for 30 or 40 copies. I think if it were known that this report could be obtained the Members would have much larger calls for it. The idea now is that they can not get it.

Mr. BARNHART. I do not understand how that could be; but even if there is such demand, after they get this voluminous set of books they will not have time nor patience to read them, and half the number authorized would be more than will ever be sent out to people who want them and will read them.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. LAMB the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 18960) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, with Mr. BORLAND in the chair.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. How much time is still left for general debate?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB] has 1 hour and 50 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] has 1 hour and 49 minutes remaining.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY]. [Applause.]

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, in the time which I shall occupy this afternoon in the discussion of this bill I shall confine myself almost wholly to those things that I think pertain to the bill itself. It is not my intention at this time to discuss matters which are not before the House.

The importance of the work of the Committee on Agriculture can not be overestimated, and the benefits to be derived by the passage of the pending bill which it has prepared and submitted to this House can not be overstated. More than any other of the great appropriation bills, this one comes nearest to the great body of the American people.

On the 14th day of the present month the President of the United States issued his proclamation, and Arizona, the last of the organized Territories, became a part of this great Union.

Forty-eight imperial States, embracing that vast territory extending from Canada on the north to Mexico and the Gulf on the south and lying between the Atlantic and the Pacific, unite to form this great Nation, a Nation unexcelled, yea, unequaled in all the history of the world. [Applause.]

As we turn the pages of American history we are surprised and gratified at the great progress she has made. This great Republic, composed as it is of many States, each of which in its individual capacity is imperial, and yet all bound together by the stronger ties of the General Government, presents to the world the example of a Nation that meets with universal approval, one that has often been imitated but has never been equaled. Much of the advancement of the Nation is due to the progress and the development within the individual States. Each has its own laws, its own officers, and, with commendable zeal, each strives earnestly for those things which will be for the upbuilding, the advancement, and the betterment of its own citizens. Each becomes a generous rival of the other, each vies with the other in loyalty, and each is bound to the other and to the Nation by the Constitution of the United States—the supreme law of the land. The General Government reaches out its protecting hand to all parts of the country. The President is the President of all of the people, and his executive authority extends to all the States. The judiciary issues its decrees, and its decisions are supreme everywhere. The Congress is the Congress of every State. It is the Congress of all the people, and it should legislate for all the States and all the people with equal and exact justice.

Let us turn our attention for just a moment to some of the really great things which have made for advancement, and in connection with each and every one of them let us see what the Congress of the United States has done to assist in its development.

Our seacoast is indented with beautiful and extensive harbors—the open doors that invite the commerce of the world. Congress has with generous hand given much aid to the improvement of these harbors and has expended upon them millions of dollars. Through every part of the country flow great rivers and their tributaries, bearing our products from city to city and on to the sea. Realizing their importance as means of transportation, Congress has spent millions of dollars in deepening channels, revetting banks, and in every way improving these great waterways.

Our great railroads, extending from sea to sea, sending their subdivisions and branches in all directions, covering the land with a network of steel, reach almost to every hamlet and village. As I speak to you this afternoon thousands of freight trains are bearing the products of the factory, of the farm, and of the mine to their respective markets in all parts of the country. Modern passenger trains, laden with travelers, rush to their destinations, bearing their precious freight of human souls in comfort, ease and luxury. In the building of railroads Congress has taken an important part. Millions of acres of the best land of this country have been given to the railroads—aye, even more than have been given to homeseekers for homesteads.

We boast of our factories and our mills, giving employment to thousands and sending their products into all the world. For years and years this Government has, by its high protective-tariff system, compelled the people living in every nook and corner of this Republic to pay tribute to these great institutions. Under this policy of protection these institutions have grown so efficient and so powerful that they are now sending their products into foreign markets and with absolute lack of appreciation of a generous and long-suffering people, who have during all these years contributed to their upbuilding, they are selling abroad cheaper than they are selling at home.

Our mineral resources are important; the same policy of protection that extends to the factory extends to the products of the mines. The mineral products are protected, the mine owner is thereby benefited, and he owes much to the General Government for the advancement of his industry.

Time will not permit me to take up every great industry that has had to do with our development and upbuilding. I come now to one that stands in importance far above any of these, an industry that in the progress and development of the Republic has played a greater part than any of those I have mentioned, if not, indeed, a part greater than all of them combined. Agriculture is the greatest industry in America to-day. [Applause.] Without it we would have no use for our magnificent harbors. Take it away, and the boats that ply on our great rivers would rot and decay. Stop the plow, and the railroad trains would stand still, the tracks would grow up with weeds, the factories would close their doors, and the mines would cease to operate. [Applause.]

Six and one-half millions of farmers, who with their families constitute nearly one-third of the population of the United States, cultivating, as they do, more than 500,000,000 acres of land, raising annually more than $8,000,000,000 of products—the foodstuff of 90,000,000 of people—present to us the picture of an industry so vast and so great that its importance can not be estimated. Upon the successful operation of the farms of this land must depend for their foodstuff the toiling millions who labor in the factories, in the mines, and upon the great railway systems. To the farmer must look for food all who live in the great cities of the country. Briefly stated, upon agriculture must depend every man, woman, and child throughout the land.

Congress has almost from the beginning recognized the importance of other great industries and has legislated for them generously, but it has been only in recent years that it has awakened to the importance of agriculture. Prior to 1900 the entire amount of money given to the Department of Agriculture by Congress was less than $45,000,000. Since then the amount appropriated has been $107,000,000 making an aggregate amount appropriated for the Department of Agriculture $152,000,000 of which more than $100,000,000 have been appropriated within the last 10 years. Even in recent years the amount of money appropriated for agriculture has been indeed meager, when compared with the vast sums appropriated for other things. Since 1900, $1,512,161,984 have been appropriated for the maintenance of the Army of the United States, $1,275,941,034 for the Navy, $301,326,049 for rivers and harbors, and $140,721,541 for public buildings. The appropriation bill a year ago, in a time of profound peace, carried for the Army and Navy $219,613,885 a sum greater than has been appropriated for agriculture since the establishment of the Government, and a sum more than twice as great as has been appropriated since 1900.

Why all these preparations for war in a time of absolute peace? A hundred years have passed since the country was invaded by a foreign foe, and, in my opinion, the time will be far distant—centuries will come and go—before a foreign nation will ever again attempt to invade the United States of America. [Applause.] But should the invader come, let me say to you, history will repeat itself. Away back yonder in revolutionary days it was the embattled farmer that stood on the plains of New Hampshire and “fired the shot heard around the world.” It was the American farmer, poorly armed and equipped, who stood with Jackson at New Orleans and repelled the British invader an hundred years ago. From the fields came the bulk of our Army that marched down into Mexico and carried our flag to victory and planted it triumphantly upon the battlements of the Montezumas. It was the boys from off the farms and from out the small villages that constituted the Army in the Spanish-American War; and it was a farmer boy—a Missouri boy, if you please—who in that struggle planted the first American flag on Cuban soil. [Applause.] In the years to come it will be the American farmer who will stand ever ready to defend his country, and upon him will we largely depend should a foreign foe darken our borders.

In view of these facts, why these great appropriations for the maintenance of a large standing Army and for the addition of numerous battleships to our Navy? Prior to the Spanish-American War, in the year 1898, Congress appropriated only twenty-three millions for the Army, less than one-fourth the amount appropriated annually since that time. In the same year it appropriated only thirty-three millions for the Navy, whereas last year the appropriation amounted to one hundred and twenty-six millions. It is time to call a halt. If one-half of the money that has been spent during the last 40 years for the maintenance of the Army and the Navy had been spent for internal improvement—upon the rivers, improving them and adapting them to commerce; upon the roads, aiding the various States in the construction of public highways—the conditions throughout the length and breadth of this land would, in my opinion, be advanced far more than they are today.

Let us see briefly what the Department of Agriculture has been doing in the recent years that it has taken up this work. Feeling that the work must be known to be appreciated, every effort has been made to bring it in close contact with the great body of the people throughout all parts of the country, until to-day the work of the Agricultural Department is felt throughout the Republic. Investigations are being made in every possible line of agriculture. Experiments are being tried in everything that can be thought of, the result of which will bring improvement and advancement. The results of these investigations and experiments are carried to the farmer in bulletins and by personal representatives of the department. Men are sent out to visit communities here and there. The department, cooperating with the agricultural agencies of the various States, is sending out upon great lines of railway its special cars laden with agricultural products and accompanied by the best specialists in the land. These cars are stopped at points all along the line, farmers are notified far in advance of their coming, lectures are delivered, demonstrations are made, questions are answered, information given, and great interest is developed wherever they go.

A few years ago the boll weevil made its appearance and threatened the entire destruction of the cotton of the South. The Agricultural Department, cooperating with States and private citizens, has taken hold of this work and has by means of its farm demonstrations throughout the South proved to the farmers in that section that the way to meet this evil and to counteract it is to diversify the crops they seek to raise upon their land. As a result, throughout all that great country farmers who only a few years ago depended entirely upon the cotton crop are to-day raising all kinds of agricultural products, and that great section of the country bids fair to become the agricultural garden spot of the world. [Applause.]

What has been done in the South in the way of teaching the people diversification of crops, improving the soil, and all that sort of thing, can be done and should be done throughout other agricultural districts. Our committee has before it now for its consideration a bill introduced by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER], which provides that the Department of Agriculture shall, cooperating with agricultural colleges of the various States, place men in the field in every State, whose duty it shall be to study soil conditions, cooperate with the farmers themselves, and carry on a complete system of farm demonstration. In my opinion, this is one of the most important measures before Congress to-day. It would stimulate agriculture everywhere, and should be passed without delay.

It is impossible for the Department of Agriculture through its personal representatives to reach every farmer. It is, however, making up for this by the issuing of the Farmers' Bulletins. The results of experiment and investigation are set forth in brief, concise form in bulletins, and these are sent out in great numbers to the men upon the farm. They have been written upon almost every conceivable subject, and the farmer, after his day's labor is over, may sit by the fireside in the evening and by the aid of this bulletin get a large amount of valuable information and receive much encouragement and instruction in the great work he is doing.

In recent years the teaching of agriculture in the country schools is required by many States. To aid the teacher in this work the Department of Agriculture has prepared a special set of bulletins. I have mailed a complete set of these bulletins to every teacher in my own congressional district, and they have been used by them in the teaching of agriculture to the children of their respective schools. Many letters which I have received, from both teacher and pupil, attest the fact of the great interest that is now being taken in the study of agriculture by the school children.

Throughout the South and in some other parts of the country boys' corn-growing contests have been conducted. Clubs have been organized in the various schools and the number of boys actively engaged in the corn-growing contests in the South number 60,000. These clubs are organized through the public schools. They have for their object not only the teaching of the boys the preparation of the soil, the planting, cultivating, and harvesting of corn, but, through the boys, the encouragement in the growing of home supplies, by the fathers. In many instances a successful corn crop grown by a boy is an efficient means to get hold of the farmer himself and to get him interested in the proposition of increasing the yield per acre of his land. In this work the department cooperates most heartily. In December last there appeared before our committee about 25 boys. These boys were the winners from the South in the corn-growing contests. Later on in February there appeared before our committee prize winners of the boys' corn-growing contests from the State of Iowa.

I hope the time may not be far distant when the boys in every State will be reached and through means similar to these may become interested, deeply interested, in the development and the betterment of farm methods and farm life. [Applause.]

Up to the present time the great work of the Department of Agriculture has been confined almost wholly to experiments and investigations that will lead to greater production. "Making two blades of grass grow where one grew before" has, up to the present time, been the great aim in the development of agriculture. Methods of fertilization, study of soils, rotation of crops, and everything of that sort has been investigated to the end that the agricultural lands of our country may be made to produce better and more abundant harvests.

One very important factor in agriculture has been to a great extent neglected, if not entirely overlooked, and that is the question as to how the farmer may best market the crops he raises, with the least possible expenditure of money; and, further, that he may secure for the labor he performs the largest possible compensation in the price he receives for such crops.

Secretary of Agriculture Wilson, in his report says:

The consumer pays a dollar for food the farmer gets less than 50 cents for. Who gets the rest?

If it be true, and we can not question it, that the farmers of this country are getting as their compensation less than half of the value of their products, then something is radically wrong. It often happens that the more abundant the crop the less the farmer receives for it. In my own country—in the Ozarks of Missouri—I have seen the trees bent over with rich, red apples, and I have seen the fruit rot upon the ground, for the reason that the current price offered was not sufficiently high to pay the cost of gathering and hauling to market. I have been informed that similar conditions have existed in other localities in other fruits and in other crops.

Several bills are now pending before the Committee on Agriculture providing for the establishment of a bureau of markets. These bills provide that there shall be established either in the Department of Agriculture or in the Department of Commerce and Labor a bureau whose business it will be to study the various market conditions of the country and to develop ways and means whereby the farmer may be informed as to how he may best preserve, pack, transport, and dispose of his products. It seems to me that this is an important movement in the right direction, and one which, if ultimately carried out and put into effect, will result in the farmer getting a larger share of every dollar's worth of produce that he raises. The farmers are to-day, and have been for many years, the poorest paid laborers in the United States, and if this bill will improve this condition let us pass it as speedily as possible.

In connection with the question of markets, I desire to say that we want a stable market, one based upon the law of supply and demand. I am unalterably opposed to all unlawful combinations made for the purpose of controlling prices. All gambling in farm products by exchanges should be prohibited by law. These men do not deal in the actual products; they buy and sell futures which they never expect to be delivered, and are enabled by their manipulations to raise and lower prices at their own sweet will to the great detriment both of the producer and the consumer. I have introduced a bill which, if passed, will, I think, absolutely prevent gambling in farm products. I do sincerely hope that this Congress will not adjourn without placing this or some similar measure upon the statute books.

There are other things that in my opinion Congress should do for the advancement of agriculture and for the upbuilding of the agricultural communities.

The Government of the United States should cooperate with the various States of the Union and assist financially in the building of public roads. And why should not the Government aid in the building of public highways? In the past it has helped to build railroads, why not help to build wagon roads? I repeat, it is an astounding fact that this Government has given to the railroads more acres of land than it has given to its citizens for homes—77,594,792 acres have been donated to railroads. This is equal to 327 acres for every mile of track laid in the United States. We have before the committee now some 25 or 30 bills upon the subject of Federal aid in the construction of public roads. I hope that the Committee on Agriculture will agree upon one of these measures, and that this Congress will put upon the statute books a law whereby in the coming years the National Government may cooperate with the various States and begin a real forward movement toward the improvement of the country roads.

For a number of years Congress has sought in every way to regulate freight rates and place them upon an equitable and just basis, to the end that the corporation may receive a just compensation for the money invested, and at the same time the shipper may not be compelled to pay exorbitant and unjust rates. This work must be continued, the Government must control the railroads, and compel them to give just rates not only to the farmer but to every shipper.

Another crying need is a means of transportation that will enable the farmer to get to market promptly those products which are perishable in their nature and which must be carried quickly and at a reasonable rate. At present there is no adequate method of transportation which meets these requirements. As now conducted, the railroads are not adequate, because freight is ordinarily held until carload or train-load lots are collected. This results in much loss in perishable commodities. The express companies transport products more promptly, but their rates are exorbitant and their service so unsatisfactory that the farmers can not profitably patronize them.

Able minds are engaged in trying to work out the farmer's transportation problem, but as yet nothing tangible has been accomplished.

It has been proposed that the parcel-post system be extended with a view to meeting the requirements. Many bills on this subject have been introduced. The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads has reported a bill which increases the weight of parcels that may be carried in the mails from 4 to 11 pounds and decreases the rate from 16 cents to 12 cents a pound. But, it is urged, the farmer can not afford to pay even 12 cents a pound to get his products to market.

Another remedy proposed is to compel the railroads to haul fast freight cars in the trains that now carry express packages, and to allow them to charge a higher rate than is collected upon freight in ton or carload lots, and yet a rate low enough to enable the farmer to profitably ship his commodities. In my opinion this would be a wise law. It would benefit not only the farmer, who would use it to ship perishable products promptly, but it would also benefit the consumer, who would receive those products in a fresher and more wholesome condition.

Another plan, advocated in bills now pending in Congress, is for the Government to condemn and take over the business of the express companies and conduct the express business itself. Eminent lawyers who have studied this question agree that the Government has the right to do this. Those who advocate Government express contend that the system would not in any measure partake of the nature of Government ownership of transportation lines; that the Government would simply collect and deliver the packages, and pay the railroads for hauling them as it now pays them for hauling the mails.

It is urged in behalf of this measure that while it would greatly increase the facilities of the farmer in getting his perishable products to market at reasonable rates, it would still be fair to the local merchant, because it would not be creating any new facility of competition against him; that the express business is already here, and the taking of it over by the Government would simply be placing it under new and better management; that it would furnish not only increased and cheaper facilities to the farmer, but to the local merchant as well.

The friends of this measure claim that it would give the people a rate of not more than half that of a parcel post. In support of this contention they have compiled comparative tables of rates, which seem to clearly make good their claims. These rates are for a distance of 196 miles, which is the average journey of express packages. I will now read these tables.

Table comparing parcel-post rates with express company rates and Government express rates.

	Parcel-post rate as proposed in bill now before the House. ¹	Express rates as now fixed by express companies.	Parcel-post rate as demanded by people who advocate it. ²	Express rate at which Government could operate express without loss.
1-pound rate.....	$0.12	$0.10	$0.08	$0.07
2-pound rate.....	.24	.16	.16	.07
3-pound rate.....	.36	.24	.24	.08
4-pound rate.....	.48	.32	.32	.09
5-pound rate.....	.60	.40	.40	.10
6-pound rate.....	.72	.45	.48	.12
7-pound rate.....	.84	.45	.56	.14
8-pound rate.....	.96	.45	.64	.16
9-pound rate.....	1.08	.45	.72	.18
10-pound rate.....	1.20	.45	.80	.19
11-pound rate.....	1.32	.50	.88	.20
Total.....	7.92	3.97	5.28	1.40

² 8 cents per pound.

From this table it is seen that the 12-cent parcel-post rates are practically double the present express rates, and the 8-cent parcel-post rates are one-third greater. On small packages, of from 1 to 2 and 3 pounds, the parcel-post rate is, at best, only about equal to the express rate, while on packages of greater weight the parcel-post rate is much higher than the express rate.

To illustrate more plainly, if an individual during a given time, say one year or less, were to send 11 different articles representing the 11 different weights, the total cost to him would be $1.40 by Government express, $3.97 by private express, $5.28 by 8-cent parcel post, and $7.92 by 12-cent parcel post.

We are here to legislate for all the people and to do that which will be of the greatest good to the greatest number. Let us consider all these propositions and agree upon and enact into law one that will accomplish the best results and bring to the people the greatest relief. For my own part, I am frank to say that, with the information I have before me, the proposition providing for Government express has much to commend it.

Thousands come to our land from every clime, they fill our cities, they compete with our laborers in the factories and in the mines; only a small per cent of them ever become farmers. We welcome the desirable, but the undesirable should be excluded.

Stringent laws should be passed regulating immigration. Let us open wide our doors to worthy homeseekers, but close them securely to those who come merely to make money and who, caring nothing for our institutions, retain their allegiance to a foreign government, whither they return when their greed for gain has been satisfied.

Mr. Chairman, in the brief time allotted to me it is impossible to discuss, even briefly, many of the things important to agriculture and helpful and stimulating to farm life. To-day, as never before, the farmers of the country are awake to the things that make for their own advancement. The rural routes bring to them the daily papers, market reports, and journals of agriculture. They have their own organizations, and they are co-operating for the development of their own great industry. By proper legislation in both State and Nation it is possible to improve farm conditions and make more attractive farm life.

Thousands of young men and young women, attracted by the glamour and the glitter of city life, have been leaving the farms and casting their lot with those who throng our large cities. This movement is in the wrong direction. It should be reversed. The boys and girls who live upon the farm should be induced to stay there, while many who are now eking out a miserable existence in our overcrowded cities should be persuaded to leave them and make their homes upon the farms. The slogan should be not only "Back to the farm," but also "Stay on the farm."

This appropriation bill carries $15,000,000. I have but one objection to it. There may be some criticisms, there may be Members who will seek to cut it down, there may be others who may seek to increase it, but the only objection I have to this appropriation bill is that it is not large enough; it does not carry enough money for the American farmer. [Applause.]

Let us cease our great appropriations for war in this age of peace. Let us increase our appropriation for the Agricultural Department and for those things that will improve and build up the farm. Let us give greater attention to internal improvement, the dredging of rivers, the construction of public highways, and the passage of bills which will benefit the great masses of American people. Let us do this, and the Congress of the United States will bring about a great change for good in the condition of affairs throughout the land. Do this, and farm life in this country will be made the best and the most desirable that can be found anywhere.

Mr. Chairman, the farmer presents the highest type of American citizenship; strong, sturdy, robust, he has toiled on in this great work of development. By the sweat of his brow he has produced 87 per cent of the wealth of the Nation. He has asked but little of the Government; he knows no eight-hour law; he goes to work with the rising of the sun, toils on through its burning rays, and ceases only with the darkness of the closing day. In justice to him, let us pass this bill without the reduction of a single item. [Loud applause.]

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I have enjoyed, and I am sure that the Members of this House have enjoyed, the splendid speech of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY]. I was glad to hear him speak in the interest of the farmers of the country. Agriculture is the corner stone of all other industries. [Applause.]

Our people are waking up to the importance of encouraging the farmer, and this means much not only to the farmer but to the country. I desire to discuss briefly a question of vital interest to the farmers of the South. The people who produce two-thirds of the world's cotton crop are laboring under great disadvantages. They are greatly imposed upon by wild speculation permitted on the cotton exchanges to-day. I desire to answer some of the arguments that are being sent to Members of Congress by persons interested in these cotton exchanges. It is not my purpose to abolish any cotton exchange, but it is my fixed purpose to help regulate the exchanges. I want the exchange to be helpful, not hurtful, to the cotton producer, and unless the cotton exchange deals in real cotton and aids in distributing the crop it is not helpful, but harmful, to the farmer. I shall continue to fight for that regulation which will require the exchange to deliver the grade of cotton named in the contract. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, the New York Cotton Exchange, under its rules, is permitted to tender me any grade of cotton that it chooses, although that exchange has with me a solemn contract to deliver to me strict middling cotton, we will say, worth 14 cents per pound. When the day comes to fulfill the contract they tender me cotton worth not more than 2 cents per pound. I say that that is not a compliance with the contract, and has in no way helped the cotton producer, but this practice injures him. I can not use the cotton tendered me by the exchange, and I decline to take it. Then the exchange man is not offended; he is happy, because he is conducting what he calls a cotton business without the use of real cotton, and he keeps the same unspinnable cotton that he offered me to offer to thousands of other men.

The size of the cotton crop has nothing to do with the amount handled on the exchange. They sell a hundred million bales and never call on the farmer for cotton with which to fill the contracts, and they do not fill the contracts. The cotton that they handle is what I have called here on another occasion "dummy cotton." Discussing this question with a northern gentleman once, he said:

This exchange cotton is like the saloon sandwiches once used in my town. It was against the law to sell whisky on Sunday unless something to eat was served with it. Fifteen cents a drink on Sunday, with a sandwich thrown in.

And he said:

Do you know what the bartender did? He had some sandwiches made of wood and painted so as to resemble brown bread, and in the middle something that resembled a slice of meat, and when a man came in and asked for a drink of whisky on Sunday they would put a wooden sandwich with the drink on the table. The man took his drink and they took his 15 cents, and then they put the dummy sandwich back and sold it over and over again to a thousand men; and they called that complying with the law, but they never called on the baker or butcher for bread or meat.

That is what is going on to-day in the New York Cotton Exchange and probably in some of the others. They do not deliver real cotton, but they keep a certain grade of dummy cotton to serve on contracts; but this cotton remains in New York, and, like the saloon sandwich, is served over and over again to thousands and thousands of men, but they do not call on the producer for cotton.

I have a letter here from a gentleman in Texas in which he says:

Cotton exchanges, all of them, should be regulated as far as is possible to prevent their using their machinery to make inoperative the law of supply and demand.

I want everything removed that hinders the law of supply and demand. Why, if an exchange never has to call upon the man who produces cotton, for real cotton, is the exchange aiding the farmer or helping to carry out the law of supply and demand? Say, for instance, the farmer has a bale of cotton. Under a bear raid on the exchange in less than one week it will be reduced $15 in value, as values are fixed on the exchange. It is good cotton, and the value of that cotton for the purposes of the spinner is unchanged from the beginning of the bear raid to that time. You can keep a bale of cotton a hundred years, or longer than that, and it will be spinnable and good cotton at the end of that time if kept in a dry place.

And yet by bear speculation they beat the price down. They create an unnatural condition and cause destructive fluctuations in the price. But some one says, "Can not the bulls put the price up?" And I answer: The bull is an uncertain quantity. He is in to-day and out to-morrow; he does not abide like the bear. The bear is backed by the spinning interest of the world. [Applause.] He must have cotton all the time, and this is why these bear agents are on the exchange all the time. The bull goes in only when he thinks that there is a chance of making money by speculating. The bear is in all the time because he represents an interest that must have cotton all the time, and he uses every means possible to reduce the price of cotton just as low as he possibly can. The New York Exchange limits its membership to 450 members, and you can safely count three-fourths of its members as bears. If they had no limit on their membership, the cotton producers of the country might buy seats on the exchange and the bear and bull forces might be more equally divided. But, oh, no, they have limited the number to 450, and whenever there is a vacancy they pass on the applicant and scrutinize carefully the credentials of the gentleman who buys that seat. A seat sold some time ago for $17,000.

Men buy a license to speculate on the farmer's products, and the speculation injures the farmer.

I read further from the letter of a Texas gentleman:

They buy futures with no intention of receiving the actual cotton, because under the exchange rule the seller is privileged to deliver practically any grade, and they might be forced to receive such grades that were as unsuitable as baled hay to make cotton goods with.

Mr. FORNES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. FORNES. Does the law compel the cotton producer to sell direct to the New York Cotton Exchange? Could he not sell direct to the consumer?

Mr. HEFLIN. No; the law does not compel the producer to sell cotton direct to the New York Cotton Exchange. The New York Exchange does not handle real cotton, but by the operation of its rules injures the price of the farmer's cotton. I will read another line from the Texas letter which touches this situation:

The contract for future delivery should be revised to specify the grade to be tendered for delivery, as is done in selling and buying spot cotton. For instance, I agree to deliver middling, average; nothing below low middling or basis middling; nothing below strict ordinary—

And so forth.

Why not require the exchange to do what is required of the man selling spot cotton for future delivery? If he agrees to deliver on a certain day 100 bales of a certain grade he is compelled to comply with the contract.

Now, Mr. Chairman, with the New York Cotton Exchange holding this dummy cotton, grades unfit to spin, year in and year out, tendering it to this man and that man and the other man, and nobody taking it, and keeping it there for years and years, they are injuring the cotton farmer. What we want to do, I will say to my friend from New York, is to fix it so that whoever deals in cotton will have to call on the farmer some time for cotton with which to fill the contracts.

That is what I am contending for to-day, and that is what the farmer is contending for. A gentleman in Dallas, Tex., Mr. N. T. Blackwell, who is editor of the Cotton and Cotton Oil News, of Dallas, Tex., has written a letter to all the Members of this House and the Senate, urging them to oppose the Heflin bill, looking to the regulation of cotton exchanges; and he goes on to say that it would be detrimental to the farmer. The gentleman is making the same argument that the cotton exchanges make.

I have heard the same argument made by members of the New York Cotton Exchange.

They have issued a book, 124 pages, which also pleads the cause of the cotton exchange, and they have circulated it through the South. And they have sent out a speech purporting to have been made by this same gentleman, N. T. Blackwell, of Texas, and here it is. They have sent it to all the papers of the South, and what do you suppose they have printed at the top of this dangerous-looking document? "Notice to the publishers: Plates of this article will be shipped to you free of charge, express prepaid. We act as manufacturers. Return the metal to the Western Newspaper Union." The Western Newspaper Union's headquarters, I understand, are in Chicago.

Who is putting up the money to send all this plate matter to thousands and thousands of papers in the South, paying the express charges to and from the newspapers? Who is furnishing the money to publish all these little books now being circulated? Why, Mr. Chairman, it is costing somebody a large sum of money to send out the literature that they are now sending out to attack my bill, which simply demands that the exchange shall deal in real cotton. [Applause.]

The exchanges have grown wise in the last few years. They no longer issue their documents direct from the exchanges to Congress. They go out in the States and get some fellow there who pretends to be a friend of the farmer, and he fathers their arguments. N. T. Blackwell, of Texas, in the position that he has taken, places himself in the column of the real enemies of the cotton producers of the South. [Applause.] No man well informed on cotton can read his effusions in defense of gambling in cotton and class him as a friend of the farmer.

Why, this year, Mr. Chairman, the speculative exchanges, it is said, have sold to the foreign spinners, five years in advance, a portion of five crops to be made in the future. The farmer is having his product gambled in and bartered away one, two, three, four, and five years before he plants it or produces it. What kind of a combination must the farmer face two years from now, and four years from now, and five years from now? Millions of dollars' worth of cotton have been bartered by these men who own no cotton. What a powerful combination is at work to rob the cotton farmer!

The speculator will say at the end of that time, "We have got a contract with you for cotton. What are you going to do about it?" The answer will be, "I am going to force you to deliver it if I can." "I need your aid in putting the price down," the speculator says, and the spinner says, "That is not hard to get. You know that. I want to buy the raw material as cheaply as possible, and I'll back you in bearing the market." He has got his own interest at stake. If the speculator contracts to deliver 500,000 bales of cotton at 12 cents a pound, he will, if he can, buy it at 10 cents a pound and make something more for himself before it goes into the hands of the man to whom he has promised to deliver it at 12 cents a pound.

Mr. FORNES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HEFLIN. Certainly.

Mr. FORNES. The gentleman agrees with me that there is no law of man that can change the price except the natural law of supply and demand?

Mr. HEFLIN. No, sir.

Mr. FORNES. There is no law?

Mr. HEFLIN. I disagree with the gentleman on that. We are striving to come to the time when the law of supply and demand will have full and free operation, but the exchanges, by supplying a fictitious product and misrepresenting the facts about crops and the movement of cotton through subsidized newspapers, create a false condition that robs the farmer of his product. [Applause.]

Mr. FORNES. Did I not understand the gentleman to answer a question in which I inquired whether the producer can not sell direct to the consumer? Did not the gentleman say, "Certainly, he can"?

Mr. HEFLIN. He can. But the exchange as conducted to-day is resorted to for the purpose of beating down the price that the farmer must take from the consumer.

Mr. FORNES. Now, if that is the fact, can not the producer do without the cotton exchange?

Mr. HEFLIN. He can; for as it is now conducted it is hurtful to the farmer. [Applause.] I want to regulate the exchanges.

Mr. POUL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. HEFLIN. With pleasure.

Mr. POUL. I want to ask the gentleman if several years ago the people of the States could not also have gotten along without the Louisiana State lottery?

Mr. HEFLIN. Certainly they could. It was not helpful, but hurtful to the State.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. HEFLIN. Certainly.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I am very much interested in the gentleman's argument upon cotton, but can he not tell us whether the same argument applies to gambling in grain, wheat, oats, and rye?

Mr. HEFLIN. It certainly does.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. The gentleman reminds me of this, because he says the cotton is sold before it is gathered. Now, wheat is sold, and it is not yet out of the ground in many sections of the country.

Mr. HEFLIN. The only difference, as I understand it, is that the New York Cotton Exchange uses 28 different grades of cotton, and, as I understand it, there are not over 4 grades of grain. Now, as I have said before on this floor, they sell you strict middling cotton, but when they come to deliver they can deliver you any one or some or all of the 28 different grades. On the grain exchange if you contract to deliver No. 2 wheat you can not deliver No. 3 wheat. Suppose you contract with a man to sell you a pair of white horses 16 hands high and on the day of the delivery he brings you two Texas ponies. Has he complied with your contract?

No fair-minded man would say that he has, and yet that is what the New York Exchange does. It sells you a strict middling cotton, and it will deliver to you dog-tail cotton that you can not use, that you did not buy, and that you do not want, and then settle the difference with you in money. What does that do? That puts actual cotton out of the transaction, and I may stand here with 10 bales of cotton to sell, but they speculate on the exchange and settle the difference in money. After a few days I find that my 10 bales of cotton are worth $15 a bale less than when they started to speculating. They have been dealing in cotton, but nobody has called on me for cotton. Does the spinner buy? I answer my friend from New York, no. Why? He is waiting until the exchange beats the price down so that he can get it cheaper. [Applause.] That is why he does not buy my cotton. Now, suppose we require the exchange to deliver cotton as agreed in the contract. What will the spinner do? He will take the cotton then, because the contract stipulates that a certain grade of cotton shall be delivered at a certain time. Then what will the broker on the exchange do? He will turn his eyes to the South and will say, "I want a thousand bales of cotton. I have a contract with the spinner to deliver him a thousand bales of strict middling cotton. Can you sell it to me?" You sell it to him, and it takes cotton to fill the contract. The farmer makes a profit on his cotton, and the exchange is a helpful function to the farmer.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as a result of bear gambling on the New York Cotton Exchange our farmers have been robbed of millions of dollars during this selling season. As a further result of this gambling thousands of acres of cotton are rotting in the field now. Men are plowing in cotton, nearly a bale to the acre in some places, and they are sowing oats and making ready to plant corn. They are driven to this by bear speculation. Now, what do you find? The southern Members of Congress are receiving letters every day, saying, "Send me bulletins on corn culture. Send me bulletins on hog raising, on hay, on peas. We are going to quit planting so much cotton; we are going to reduce our acreage, and if we make a small crop we will get more for it than we do for a big crop, and good sense tells us to make a small crop." We are reducing cotton acreage. Here are responses which I have just received from five commissioners of agriculture in the cotton States. I wired only these commissioners of agriculture:

COLUMBIA, S. C., February 28, 1912.

Hon. J. THOS. HEFLIN,
United States House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Canvass individual growers by townships; nearly complete actual signed pledges assure average reduction entire State of at least 15 per cent; may be 25 when all returns received.

E. J. WATSON,
President Southern Cotton Congress.

ATLANTA, GA., February 28, 1912.

J. THOS. HEFLIN,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.:

Cotton acreage in Georgia will be reduced 20 or 25 per cent.

T. G. HUDSON.

AUSTIN, TEX., February 28, 1912.

Hon. J. T. HEFLIN,
Washington, D. C.:

Your wire 28th. Reports all parts of State indicate material reduction common acreage. Many conservative farmers believe it approximate 20 per cent.

ED. R. KONE.

JACKSON, MISS., February 28, 1912.

J. THOMAS HEFLIN,
Washington, D. C.:

Yes; acreage will be reduced 15 per cent on account boll weevil.

W. E. BAKESLEE.

MONTGOMERY, ALA., February 28, 1912.

Hon. J. THOS. HEFLIN,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.:

Farmers signing pledges for cotton-acreage reduction all over State.

R. F. KOLB,
Commissioner of Agriculture and Industries.

Mr. Chairman, the amount of fertilizers purchased in the South is one-third less than last year.

Why this reduction in cotton acreage? Because our people have not been able to get a good price for cotton. We received 14½ and 15 cents for the last two crops, but this crop is selling below the cost of production. But some say the price of cotton is going up a little. Yes; that is always the case. After cotton leaves the farmer, after it has gone out of the hands that produce it from the ground and it gets into the hands of people who can hold it, they bull the market and it does go up, but the man who produces it has already been impoverished by bear gambling on the exchange. [Applause.]

But, Mr. Chairman, this gentleman from Texas, Mr. Blackwell, who poses as the farmer's friend, says that if you destroy the speculative exchange you put cotton on the same footing with sugar, coffee, and tobacco. Why did he not say that you will put it on the same footing with wool; why did he not say that you will put it on the same footing with hay? There is no wool exchange, and yet wool fares better in the market place than cotton. There is no hay exchange, and yet the hay crop of the United States is greater than the cotton crop of the United States. Why did he not put it on the same footing with cotton seed?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I will yield the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. HOWARD. I yield him my time.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, cotton seed has no exchange to exploit it. Cotton seed has no exchange to fix its price, and yet I have seen the price of cotton seed rise from $5 to $25 a ton. Wool has no exchange, as I said. Why is it that wool fares so well, and why do they not have an exchange on wool? It is a product that must be made into clothing. Hay is a tremendous industry in our country, and it has no exchange. Why is it that hay and wool can get along so well without an exchange?

But this Texas gentleman fears that the cotton farmer could not get along without the exchange, as the wool, hay, and cottonseed people do. The cotton farmer could count the cost of production and add a reasonable profit. That is what the wool men do; that is what the hay men do; that is what the cottonseed men do. Then, who would buy the cotton? Thousands of men. Who buys mules now? Thousands of men. They have no mule exchange, but they know how much a good mule is worth—some of them bring $250, and so hundreds of men who buy the real mule must put that amount of money in him. He can not gamble on him, but he must put up $250. We want to reach the time when a man who wants a $65 bale of cotton will put $65 into it instead of putting up just $1 a bale to speculate on. [Applause.]

Mr. FORNES. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes.

Mr. FORNES. The gentleman said there was no wool exchange; that there was no horse exchange. Is not the gentleman aware that the London Wool Exchange fixes the price of wool for the entire world? Is not the gentleman aware that there are such institutions as horse exchanges in New York?

Mr. HEFLIN. No, sir.

Mr. FORNES. Is not the gentleman aware that for every commodity there is a market, whether it be for grain, apples, or any product that is raised by nature or produced by man?

Mr. HEFLIN. I am glad the gentleman from New York has interrupted me again. There are wool dealers in London, and those who are dealing in wool deliver wool according to the contract; and those who deal in mules deliver mules according to the contract. That is what we want done in the case of cotton. [Applause.]

Mr. FORNES rose.

Mr. HEFLIN. I am sorry, but my time is limited and I can not yield to the gentleman now. Some of the exchanges now display much interest in the farmer. They are afraid that the farmer will be injuriously affected by legislation that looks to the regulation of the exchange. Suppose the exchanges refuse to do business unless we allow them to continue to plunder and rob the cotton producer. There would be spot-cotton exchanges all over the South. What would they do? They would deal in cotton just like a great mule dealer deals in mules. He buys mules, thousands of mules; he does not put a dollar a head on them like they do a dollar a bale on cotton and reduce the price of that mule $15. When he buys him he has to feed him, he has to groom him, he has to look out for the welfare of the mule and ship him to a given point and there sell him and deliver him to the man who buys him.

But the exchanges sell cotton, and they never see any cotton, much less deliver cotton, and by the use of a dollar a bale the bear beats down the farmers' cotton $20 a bale. Is that fair? It is unfair; it is wrong. [Applause.] Take the mule industry in Kansas City, Mo. There are 25 or 30 of them. They do not speculate; they buy mules and horses, and I dare say one of them has got $25,000,000—yes, $30,000,000—invested in live stock in the United States. They ship mules into my country, and I have seen them sell for $500 a pair in my town, and then cotton brought $75 a bale. I have seen the bear speculators reduce cotton to $45 a bale, and yet the farmer had to pay the $250 for the mule that he bargained for when he received $75 a bale. You say, "Why did not the farmer hold his cotton?" Thousands were not able to hold it; they were forced to sell; debts were coming due in October, November, and December, and they had to sell—many of them. This Texas gentleman, Mr. Blackwell, says that if HEFLIN's bill should have a favorable report it would break the price of cotton $5 a bale. Oh, how anxious he is about the farmer, this man Blackwell!

The Scott bill, looking to the regulation of exchanges, was favorably reported from the Committee on Agriculture in April, 1910, and cotton went up between 40 and 50 cents a bale the next day. That bill passed this House in June, 1910, and cotton went up again the next day, so, if history repeats itself, let us hurry and report my bill, or some other bill, out of the Committee on Agriculture. [Applause.] My friend from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] informs me that when the Senate defeated the Scott bill cotton went down immediately, so we had better bring a bill in and put it through both the House and the Senate, and then the Lord only knows what will happen to it with the vetoing President. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I hope the gentleman will promise me he will help to bring my bill along with his.

Mr. HEFLIN. I promise the gentleman that I will do all in my power to relieve the western farmer, the northern farmer, and the eastern farmer from the clutches of the grain-gambling exchanges. [Applause.] Yes; I want to regulate gambling in grain, I want to regulate the gambling in cotton so that when a man claims to deal in cotton he must handle cotton. What benefit is the exchange to the farmer if it does not help distribute the crop? What benefit is it to the spinner if it does not help distribute the crop?

I will tell you how it benefits the spinner by putting the price of cotton down so that the spinner can buy the raw material as cheaply as possible. The incentive is always there to bear the market. It is to the interest of the spinners of the world. But this gentleman from Texas, Mr. Blackwell, says the New York Exchange and the New Orleans Exchange are the producers' exchanges; that Liverpool is the spinners' exchange. The New York Commercial, a reliable cotton paper, said that in 1910 the bears were unable to pick up spot cotton in the South and had 50,000 bales shipped back from Liverpool. Does that look like these exchanges are pulling against each other? One representing the spinner and the other the producer? The producers' exchange wants 50,000 bales of contract cotton from the spinners' exchange at Liverpool, and it gets it from the spinners' exchange, which, while it is real mad with the producers' exchange [laughter and applause], lets it have the contract cotton to help it out of a tight place. [Laughter.] That is the ridiculous attitude that this Texas man's argument finds itself in. Members of the New York Exchange belong to the Liverpool Exchange, and members of the Liverpool Exchange belong to the New York Exchange. The South demands that all these exchanges shall be required to perform legitimate and helpful functions in the matter of distributing and helping to secure a reasonable price for cotton. We want competitive buying; we want transactions in real cotton; we want everything removed that hinders the honest operation of the law of supply and demand. [Loud applause.]

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER].

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, after the strategic scoring of this morning for the political poll at the election polls in November next, looking at times as if it might end in tragedy, and then listening to these worthless arguments upon this dry subject of agriculture, I am moved to draw the attention of the House to something both serious and of transcendent importance.

Mr. Chairman, my attention has just been called to an article which appeared in the Binghamton Republican and was reproduced in the current number of the American Economist, and I ask the Clerk to read the marked paragraph which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Representative RUCKER of Missouri, after the Democratic House caucus on the metal schedule was over Tuesday night, declared that he would not abide by the Underwood plan to reduce the duties on metals, as he wanted an increased duty on zinc. Missouri produces much zinc.

I find in my morning's mail a clipping from the Baltimore Evening Star, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Special dispatch to the Star.]

ASSERTS WOMEN PURIFY POLITICS—REPRESENTATIVE RUCKER OF COLORADO GIVES HIS VIEWS.

WASHINGTON, February 21, 1912.

Women suffragists, through the efforts of Representative RUCKER of Colorado, will have an opportunity next month, March 13, to present their arguments before a congressional committee. Colorado is one of the pioneer States in women suffrage, and it was because he believed that his State should receive full credit, if national equal suffrage becomes a law, that Mr. RUCKER asked the women of Colorado to come to Washington and help him before the committee.

"Having lived in a State where women have had a right to vote for many years I know something about the benefits that come from equal suffrage," said Representative RUCKER at the Willard. "Woman purifies politics. Colorado has had woman suffrage for a greater number of years than any other State and, notwithstanding the slurs that have been occasionally directed toward the movement, I know, and the people of Colorado know, that the women have exercised a great influence in the elections. They have driven out of the State undesirable politicians. There is not a man in Colorado who would dare run for office if he had any taint on his character. This talk about Colorado women not exercising their right of franchise is misrepresentation. Eighty per cent of the good women of Colorado cast their ballots at the polls on election day. Suffrage has unquestionably improved the standard of intelligence and knowledge of the higher things of life among the women of Colorado. It has taught them to think for themselves, and has had a mighty good influence upon the male population. Colorado is much the better for woman suffrage. It stimulates the interest of women in local, State, and national affairs, and what is more important, makes the male voters weigh arguments before they cast their ballots."

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. My attention has also just been directed to the fact that my able and distinguished kinsman and namesake from Missouri a few days ago obtained the floor for the purpose of entering a plea of not guilty to the indictment of the first indiscriminating reporter, and his solemn disclaimer of the position in which the article referred to placed him. Having the honor to be the only other RUCKER in this great body—and that there are so few is a real menace to intelligent legislation—it is not only my imperative duty, but as well a distinct pleasure to assume the responsibility for the statement and to here declare that it was the Member from Colorado to whom the reference was intended and not the Member from Missouri.

The latter publication, doubtless, has not reached the Representative from Missouri, else you would have heard his earnest protest before this against the liberty taken by the Evening Star of publishing his photograph in connection with the article. On the other hand, I am subject to the humiliation of being compelled to deny that so good-looking a photograph is my own. [Laughter.]

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, when the gentleman gets through with that photograph of mine I will be glad if he will return it. [Laughter.]

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I am too proud of it to do so. I am going to keep it. [Laughter.]

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Surely.

Mr. OLMSTED. I want to ask if there is a beauty contest going on between the two gentlemen of the same name? [Laughter.]

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I was afraid there would be another contest, and therefore I am on my feet. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I should not venture, if ever so briefly, to trespass upon the indulgence of the House and break my habit-ual and sometimes commendable silence, were it not for the apprehension of the serious dire consequences that may befall me, both politically and personally, by reason of this misleading and insinuating publication. Were there no additional aggravation I might still be silent, but I have constantly recurring reminders of the fact that whenever my talented namesake evolves something that is unworthy of special remark—however seldom that may be—it is, to my natural exasperation, promptly attributed to me. I am likewise the victim of the converse of the proposition, for whenever I deliver myself of some sparkling gem or contribute from my abundance of legislative wisdom something that is of real merit—which, you all know, is coincident with my saying anything at all—it is similarly as promptly accorded to my brilliant kinsman.

You possessors of the less renowned and euphonic patronymics, such as ANDERSON, CLARK, MOON, MARTIN, TAYLOR, SMITH, JOHNSON, and others, are naturally less disturbed by the possibility of confusion, and in the maintenance and preservation of your individual identity, which we who are so prominently in the legislative "limelight," and whose expressions are so critically scrutinized, are so extremely jealous of. And it is not only the pride and glory of the present generation of this illustrious name and the individual responsibility for our acts and deeds that we must uphold and safeguard, but the deathless achievements of an equally illustrious ancestor. Those of you who will scan the pages of immortal history will be illumined by the knowledge that the greatest admiral of the North Sea, a patriotic and militant Hollander, bore, in honor and fame, that proud name. The critical historians, I may say in passing, and as a merely collateral fact, brutally declare that this same Admiral Rucker beguiled his moments of leisure by indulging in some incidental acts of piracy, which, however, detracted none the less from his fame, and he would have been known just as well as Capt. Kidd had he been hung, which is equivalent to saying if he had been caught. [Laughter.]

But I find I am digressing somewhat, Mr. Chairman. The unfortunate divergence of opinion between my universally esteemed and amiable kinsman and myself upon the metal schedule is far afield of what brings me to my feet at this time. If my fellow Members of this body had the faintest conception of the genuine grief which this very serious failure of proper identification has occasioned me, I would be assured of even a more patient and sympathetic hearing.

Though you, Mr. Chairman, are aware, and the more or less attentive reading public generally understand, that I am a Representative from the State of Colorado, it should be borne in mind that here we have on whitest paper and in blackest ink the exalting and seductive insinuation that I am a Representative from the State of Missouri, against which flattering indictment, in the interest of accuracy, and as well of domestic harmony, I rise to register my earnest and vigorous disclaimer. [Applause.]

Now, please, brother Missourians, keep your seats and bear with me for a moment, for I see some evidence of kindling resentment in your countenances, remembering that you claim allegiance to that great Commonwealth whose citizens, it has been sometimes jocularly said, require things revealed, and this shall now be my pleasure and privilege. [Laughter.]

Whilst I claim no such dignifying allegiance, yet it is but fair for me to say that on my way from my birthplace, that good old State of Kentucky, I did really linger long enough in the State of Missouri to have my wagon mended. I am also frank to confess that as soon as that was accomplished I hurriedly took my departure for the "land of promise," of which but for your inertia and the quarantine laws enacted after my arrival you might now be enrolled as respected citizens. [Laughter and applause.] It is true that some invidiously inclined persons in Colorado upon my arrival suggested that I ought not to have been in "such a darned big hurry to leave Missouri," because, after all, the jury might not have found me guilty. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, when one contemplates the pyramids, intuitively he entertains the melancholy reflection that it will only be a few more thousand years ere the dews of heaven, the invincible warfare of the elements, the rays of the sun, and the impalpable sands sweeping the desert will conspire to crumble them back to common earth, and he recalls the prophetic lines of Kingsley:

So fleet the works of man back to the earth again,
Ancient and holy things fade like a dream.

Realizing that the latter designation in the couplet has peculiar application to myself I look with grave apprehension upon the future. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. That is all I wanted. I thank the gentleman from Iowa very much for his courtesy.

And now I implore you, Mr. Chairman, to follow me for a moment, in imagination, to that inevitable period in the future and contemplate with me a shaft of granite or marble—I am not apprised of its possible construction—whose pinnacle for only a few centuries at most may be allowed to flirt with the dancing, laughing stars, and although chiseled upon its seemingly enduring face will be my name as sometime a Representative from Colorado, yet, alas—and here the pathos of the situation soars to its sublimest zenith, for I too well know, and, indeed, it would be an insult to the intelligence of this great body should I for a moment undertake to conceal my conviction—that as surely as the world revolves, the rains of spring, the withering summer's sun, the winds of autumn, and the sleet of winter will in ceaseless and pitiless battle efface that chiseled memorial, yea, prone the shaft, and thus will be wrought the utter destruction of my identity to an inquisitive posterity. [Applause.]

I realize that I am taking long chances in averting a calamity, but the desperateness of the situation justifies me in, at this time, buckling on my armor and crossing swords in mortal combat with those cruel, immutable, and inexorable laws of nature. For, perchance, when this edifice through an apartment of which my voice is now resounding, consequent to the corroding influences of time, will have gone with the pyramids, and when that memorial shaft has followed their footprints in "the paths of glory" back to earth, the RECORD of to-morrow morning containing these remarks may, by some straggling and discerning antiquarian, in the interest of accurate history, be snatched from this pile and perhaps be crypt within the corner stone of the counterpart of this great building in the capitol in Denver, the capital of the Nation. [Applause.]

Then, Mr. Chairman, in that remotest time, beyond the aeons which on account of the limited time at my disposal my imagination can not invade, some archeologist may discover the record resulting in the gratification of my cherished wish, the further preservation of that momentous fact that I was a Representative from the State of Colorado and not from the State of Missouri. [Applause.]

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD].

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, it is my purpose to discuss, while the agricultural appropriation bill is under consideration by the House, a subject so closely associated with the interests of the farmers of this country and, in fact, the entire people who will be affected by the legislation I desire to discuss, that I believe it not inappropriate for me to devote the entire time allotted to me by the genial gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB] to it.

Since the year 1900 the people of the entire United States have entered into a movement for the establishment throughout the country of good roads. Since this date the wealthy States of the Union have made great strides toward the improvement of their public highways.

The question of transportation has been paramount to all other questions since the dawn of civilization, and the evolution in the method and modes of transportation has been most wonderful.

Until the end of time there will be three methods of transportation, namely, railroads, water, and wagon. These methods are absolutely dependent upon one another. The railroad can not live without the wagon, and neither the railroad nor the wagon would perform its full function in the development of our Nation if it were not for the great trans-Atlantic steamships entering and leaving our ports. Each has a very important and independent function to perform in intrastate, interstate, and foreign commerce.

Two of our great systems of transportation, namely, railroads and steamship lines, have been taken over by private corporations and are operated for pecuniary gain; the third, transportation by wagon over public highways, has been taken over by the several States of the Union, and their common use is accorded to all of the people free of charge.

Those of us who have failed to give the question of transportation and its consequential tax upon the people some degree of study do not realize how great the burden carried by the people from this source is. For the convenience of this discussion we will call it a transportation tax, and we will divide the methods of transporting our commerce into three subdivisions, namely, rail, water, and wagon; and by comparison we will see whether or not the question of transportation is of more vital interest to the American people than all other questions, including the tariff and other burdens carried by direct taxation in the several States. For an understanding of the discussion of this subject we should first look into the different systems by which the people are called upon to pay tribute by way of direct and indirect taxation for the maintenance of the General Government, Federal, State, county, and municipal.

The Federal Government imposes an import, internal-revenue, and corporation tax, which in all instances is added necessarily to the cost of the imported article and the article upon which the internal revenue is imposed, and in fixed charges for the operation of the corporation paying the tax.

The State, the county, and the municipal governments levy an ad valorem tax upon the citizen according to what he possesses.

Any certain and fixed charge against the people from which they can not escape, and which is necessarily essential to their livelihood and existence, may be justly termed a tax. It will be seen further on in this discussion that the import, internal-revenue, State, county, and municipal taxes sink into utter insignificance when compared with the per capita tax imposed by railroad, water, and wagon transportation. Transportation lays its heavy hand upon all we eat, upon all we wear, upon the fuel we burn, upon the oil in the poor man's lamp, upon the lumber in our humble homes, upon the implements of the farms, upon all that is animate and inanimate moving from one place to another.

The railroads in our country have grown in magnitude and efficiency until we have perfected in America the greatest railroad system upon the habitable globe. Our navigable streams and Great Lakes are teeming with vessels, great and small, engaged in interstate traffic. Rivers and harbors are being generously dealt with by our Government in lavish appropriations for their development.

We now come to a question with which this Government has miserly dealt, practically closing its purse strings to this great need of the Nation. There is no country in the world having as many miles of public highways as the United States; there is no country upon the habitable globe making any pretense at civilization, having any roads at all, which has not more improved roads than the United States. The great retarding influence in the healthy growth of our country is the great army of unemployed in the large cities and the movement from the rural districts to the cities, which is perfectly natural as a consequence of the prevailing conditions in the country districts of our Nation. I firmly believe that the time is upon us, if this Nation expects to retain the balance of trade in its favor with the other nations of the world, that she must lend her powerful aid in the construction of good roads throughout the land.

With the hope that this Democratic House and the present administration would see the crying need for such legislation, I introduced in this Congress H. R. 12379, which seeks from the Government its aid in the construction of highways along the rural routes throughout the Nation. Probably this bill lacks perfection in many of its provisions, but in drafting it I sought the least possible resistance to the measure by asking Congress to appropriate what may be termed "a crumb from the appropriation table," or "a small 'hunk' from the pork barrel." The provisions of this bill, briefly stated, are these: That the Government, through the Commissioner of Agriculture, will have the distribution of the fund, appropriated throughout the Union according to the population of the various States, excluding from the count all cities which have over 50,000 inhabitants; that the States receiving aid from the Government must first agree before receiving this aid that they will construct such roads as are agreed upon by the Office of Public Roads of the Department of Agriculture, and that the State receiving such aid shall defray one-half of the expense so incurred in the construction of said roads along the several rural delivery routes, and that this amount on the part of the State can be defrayed either by labor, material, or money; and that when the State makes known to the Office of Public Roads, by a proper verification of same, that they have in hand the amount of money to defray the necessary one-half expense to be incurred in said construction, the Government then and there makes surveys and plans and specifications, in cooperation with the person in charge of said highways in said State. The bill limits Federal aid to rural delivery routes only. This roughly states the contents of the bill.

At the outset I confidently expect that there will be some opposition on the part of some of my colleagues to the Government taking this step on the ground that it will be paternalism and probably an invasion of the rights of States.

As far as the invasion of State rights is concerned, I hope that none of my colleagues will be unduly alarmed about the provisions of this measure. So far as I am informed, in the past the Southern States especially have been strict in their views upon the question of State rights, but I do not think that when the Government seeks to lend its beneficent aid for the upbuilding of the States they need have any fear that the States of the Union will interpose an objection to the Government appropriating money for the construction and maintenance of public highways. It is only when the Government seeks to take something away from, instead of donate something to, that the States interpose their objection to an invasion of State rights.

It will be stated that it will bankrupt the Nation to lend its aid in the construction of highways, but before this attack shall be made upon the measure let me call the attention of my colleagues to the fact that one of the most beneficent branches of our departmental service, namely, the Rural Delivery Service, is to-day traversing 42,000 different highways of the Nation and coming in daily contact with 20,000,000 of our people living in the rural districts of our country. Let me further admonish those who may have in mind an attack upon this measure on the ground that it is paternal legislation that this Government has been placed upon record completely when in the early struggles of our railroads it donated to their aid in the construction of these great arteries of transportation millions of acres of our public lands, valued at over $1,000,000,000; that we have appropriated for rivers and harbors since 1875, $592,395,000; we have appropriated for building levees upon the Mississippi River, to June 30, 1902, $16,582,000; we have appropriated for public buildings, to June 30, 1911, $213,376,000; estimated appropriations for the Panama Canal, $400,000,000; appropriations for road building in Porto Rico, the Philippines, the Canal Zone, and Alaska, $8,300,000—for public highways during the period of the making of these appropriations in the United States not one dollar.

We have in the United States 2,199,645 miles of public highways, of which only 190,679 miles, or 8.66 per cent of the total, are improved. When this statement is made as to the number of miles of public highways, Congress immediately associates with the statement the bankruptcy of the Nation if it undertakes to lend its aid to their improvement. It is estimated by the Office of Public Roads that 90 per cent of the travel over our public highways is confined to 30 per cent of our roads, and that the improvement of 440,000 miles of public roads would practically meet the present demands throughout the country. So after all it is nothing like as gigantic a proposition to construct good roads as Federal pensions, the maintenance of the Army and Navy, nor would the annual appropriation ever reach a sum as large as was added to the Federal pension roll a few days ago by this House without a tremor in the voice of a man who advocated it or who voted for it.

Mr. Chairman, to prove the absolute inability of the poorer and sparsely settled States of the Union to cope with the question of road improvement, the States of Indiana, Ohio, New York, Wisconsin, Kentucky, Illinois, California, and Massachusetts, out of a total of 190,679 miles of improved roads, have within their confines 108,093 miles of this total. Therefore, I mention these facts for the purpose of giving courage to this House that they may give this measure the consideration which it justly deserves at the hands of the Representatives of the American people.

Mr. Chairman, the sooner we, as Members of Congress, realize the fact that the money in the Treasury Building at the other end of the Avenue does not belong to us to dish out to the favored departments of this Government as we see the political exigencies demand, but that we are here only holding the commission of our people as their agents, to distribute their money for the maintenance and upbuilding of this Nation as they think best and wisest, the sooner we will conform to the true measure placed upon us by the people when they elected us and sent us here as their direct agents.

There is hardly a day passing over the head of a single Member of this House that we could not urge, and rightfully so, constitutional objections to appropriations that are made because it is expedient to the welfare of the Government that they be made. Now, Mr. Chairman, just because the farming element of the Nation does not happen to live upon a navigable stream, or does not happen to have a fort on their plantations, or happen to have a harbor in front of their homes, or a military post in their back yards is no reason why they should not have money appropriated which redounds to the benefit of every man, woman, and child living in the interior portions of our great country.

The report of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1910 shows that the tariff revenues aggregated $333,683,445. There are 18,400,000 families in the United States, according to the last census, and the tariff tax apportioned among these families would amount to $18.13 per family.

The Interstate Commerce Commission reports that the gross earnings of the railroads from transportation alone for the same period, aggregated $2,787,266,136. If this amount is divided by the number of families in the United States it will be found that the transportation tax from the railroads amounted to $151.48 per family, and further pursuing the problem, if this amount is divided by the number of inhabitants in the United States, it will be found that this tax equals $30 per capital per annum, or $2.50 per month upon every man, woman, and child. In addition to the railroad transportation tax, it is estimated that water transportation for the fiscal year 1906-7 amounted to $550,000,000, or $5.98 per capita. For the same period it is estimated that wagon transportation taxed the people of the United States $1,600,000,000, or $17.39 per capita.

In all probability the question will be asked how the cost of wagon transportation can be estimated with any degree of accuracy. To be perfectly frank with you, it can not be estimated with mathematical certainty as to the annual cost, but it is estimated by the Office of Public Roads that the average distance to market in the United States is 9.4 miles, and that the average cost for wagon transportation in this country is 25 cents per ton per mile. The total amount of freight handled by rail and water for the fiscal year 1906-7 was, in round numbers, 1,100,000,000 tons.

It is estimated that more than half of this tonnage was hauled to and from the railway and waterway by wagon, and it would be fair to estimate that as much as one-third more was finally hauled to the consumer by wagon on what we may term a second handling, making a total of 800,000,000 tons hauled by wagon. In addition to this, a large bulk of the cotton crop, which amounts approximately to 3,000,000 tons annually, is hauled from the farm to the gin, thence back to the farm, and finally to the railroad or wharf. The cost of this extra haul is not included in the above estimate. It should also be stated that large quantities of agricultural, forest, and miscellaneous products are first hauled in their crude state over the common roads before they reach the railroads and waterways, thus necessitating a rehauling of these products. So it is perfectly fair to estimate that the per capita transportation tax on the people of this country amounts to $53.37 as against a tariff tax of $18.13.

It is estimated by the Director of the Office of Public Roads, Mr. Logan Waller Page, who, in my opinion, is the greatest expert on road building and wagon transportation in the world to-day, that after a very careful study of this question by him he has discovered that the cost of transportation over the magnificent roads of England, Germany, and France by wagon is only 10 cents per ton per mile. But, eliminating any doubt as to the cost in these countries of transporting a ton a mile by wagon, we will say that it amounts to 12½ cents per ton per mile. If by the construction of good roads in the United States we can reduce the cost of wagon transportation from 25 cents per ton per mile to 12½ cents per ton per mile, we will save the people of this country, on this item alone, at the very least calculation, $500,000,000 per annum.

Much time, and very properly so, is devoted to the study of the tariff question in this country, especially that feature of the tariff which affords an unwarranted amount of protection to American industries, which gives them the right, by virtue of excessive protection, to add to the cost of the product to the consumer the tariff tax, which does not go to aid in the maintenance of the Government, but goes into the pocket of the manufacturer as a clear profit, for which the consumer receives nothing of intrinsic value. A proper solution of the tariff to a revenue basis would do no more for the people, in its final operation, than would a reduction of the cost of transportation upon the people. But it will be seen by a comparison of the tariff tax with the wagon, or mud tax, that the latter exceeds by several million dollars the tariff tax, to which we devote so much of our time and attention.

In 1817 the wagoners using the old Cumberland Road only charged 18 cents per ton per mile for hauling upon this highway, and it is said that this allowed a profit to the wagoner. To-day the average cost of wagon transportation per ton per mile is more than it was 90 years ago on this road, while on the other hand, in 1837 the railroads charged 7½ cents per ton per mile, and to-day the cost of hauling by rail is about three-fourths of a cent per ton per mile, or about one-tenth of the original rate. Previous to 1825, when the Erie Canal was completed, the cost of transporting a ton of merchandise between Buffalo and New York was $100. The rate of transportation over the Erie Canal at its opening ranged from $6 to $15 per ton, but about 25 years later the average rate was $3 to $7 per ton. The average cost of transportation on the Great Lakes and inland waterways is estimated at from one-third to one-fourth of a cent per ton per mile. In other words, it is found that for $1 it is possible to haul 1 ton 4 miles on the average country road, about 10 miles on a good highway, 140 miles by rail, 350 to 400 miles by lakes or inland waterways, and about 1,300 miles on the open sea. In short, before the farmer can avail himself of these cheaper means of transportation he must overcome the great barrier between his field and the nearest railroad station or wharf.

At the present time it costs the average American farmer about 1.6 per cent more to haul a bushel of wheat a distance of 9.4 miles from his farm to the neighboring railroad station than it does to ship it from New York to Liverpool, a distance of 3,100 miles.

If we had a system of good roads throughout the country, the farmers would save in the cost of wagon transportation of the cotton crop annually $5,076,183; of the wheat crop, $10,253,058; of the corn crop, $12,709,278; whereas it now costs for wagon transportation to get these three great crops to market twice this sum.

THE EFFECTS OF GOOD ROADS UPON FARM VALUES.

It is estimated that good roads would add from $2 to $10 per acre to land values. The total area of farm lands in the United States in 1900 was 850,000,000 acres. It is estimated an increase of $5 per acre, by the construction of good roads, would add to our taxable values $4,250,000,000 per annum.

One of the greatest drawbacks to the farmer is the fact that under the present condition of the roads throughout the country he is practically isolated from market during the winter months. This is especially true in the South, where we do not have the continuous hard freezes incident to the climate of the States farther north. No matter what prices cotton, corn, wheat, or other farm products are quoted at on a given day, if the roads are impassable the farmer is helpless to take advantage of the high prices; then when the roads are in passable condition and the great bulk of the staple crops is still in the hands of the farmer, a general movement to market necessarily follows and depresses prices, and the farmer is the loser thereby.

Another great item of cost and loss to the country is in the fact that the very time the farmer should be doing his hauling is when the ground is too wet and the weather too bad to till the soil and work his crops, but at that time the roads are also impassable; therefore he will necessarily be compelled to take good weather to market his crops and do his hauling, when he could be devoting his time to his pursuits at home.

Mr. Chairman, for the last few years we have been continually hearing the cry from every source of "Back to the farm." The brainy boys and girls of our rural districts are continually seeking to escape the social conditions prevalent in the country during the long, dreary, winter months of the year, attributable almost entirely to bad roads. The drift of our population from the rural districts to the cities is really becoming alarming. Much of the social isolation has been ameliorated by the extension of telephone lines in the country and rural free delivery, but these great conveniences do not yet satisfy those who live upon the farm. Instead of the winter months in the rural districts being the most pleasant and profitable of the year, they mean absolute social isolation. Bad roads prevent attendance at school and church; they make literary societies, social gatherings, club and lodge meetings practically impossible during the bad weather of the winter.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that I know the people who live upon the farms of this country as well as anyone. They are the most sociable people on the face of the earth. They love to go to church; they are ambitious to send their children to school. They love to visit one another and exchange ideas; they love to visit the sick; and when the week end comes they want to go to the nearest village store. The Representatives in this House who live in the large cities, either in an apartment house or in a private dwelling, can not appreciate these people. If a newcomer goes into the community, all the neighbors go and visit him and welcome him in their midst, but we can live in the large cities in an apartment house or next door to a family for 10 years and never know their names. So the cry of back to the farm will not be met, in my opinion, until something is done to make country life more attractive and the development of the farm more rapid.

In 1850, 12.5 per cent of the population of the United States were living in cities of 2,500 or over; in 1890, 35 per cent; in 1900, 40 per cent; in 1910, 46 per cent.

Mr. Chairman, the United States is the only powerful nation on earth that does not lend its aid in the construction of highways, and to-day, by the failure of this Government to do its part in the upbuilding of the Nation, it is suffering, from a commercial standpoint, the loss of millions upon millions of dollars. Just to think, the exports and imports of Germany, Belgium, and Holland, three little countries of Europe no larger than our own State of Texas, were three times as much as the exports and imports of the United States in the year 1910, and in these countries you find as fine systems of public highways as there are in the world penetrating every section of the country, placing the farmer and producer in easy access of the market by quick and cheap transportation.

It is to be hoped that this Democratic House will deal more liberally with the farmer than he has been dealt with in the past. It is to be hoped that this great Government will lend its ear to the demands of that class of our people who produced upon the farms in the year 1910, $8,926,000,000 worth of farm products. We can not be too liberal in dealing with our farmers and rural population. We must extend the work of agricultural education. We must encourage the building up of our farms. We must not be unmindful of the fact that the farmer has always been found ready to do his part in the maintenance of this Government. In times of peace he has aided in our commercial strength more than any other citizen; in times of war he has willingly laid down his hoe to shoulder his musket in defense of his country. It is stated as a historical fact that at the Battle of Gettysburg the First Minnesota Regiment went into that battle and in 35 minutes lost 83 per cent of its men in killed and wounded; the Twenty-sixth North Carolina at the same time went in with 77 strong and at the end of three days' fighting only one man out of that company was left. Mr. Chairman, these two regiments were composed entirely of farmers, and the bravery displayed by these farmer-soldiers in this great, decisive, and bloody battle of the Civil War has never been excelled by any soldiers in the history of the world.

These facts are only mentioned to call the attention of this House to the fact that the farming element of this country are not mendicants and beggars. They do not make unreasonable demands upon their country. They do not complain and grumble when they do not get everything they want; but they are making a demand of their representatives for relief from a condition in this country which amounts to a national shame. They do not ask it solely as a contribution; they see the great economic importance of direct and immediate legislation upon this subject.

The constitutional objections that were interposed in the early history of our country by President Monroe and other strict adherents to constitutional technicalities have all been overridden and cast to the four winds of the earth by subsequent acts of Congress. It is my humble opinion that in this modern day and time no Member would seriously argue that it was unconstitutional under Article I, section 8, of the Constitution, that Congress shall have the power to "establish post offices and post roads"; that this Congress could not appropriate money for the improvement and maintenance of roads over which this Government daily carries its mail. If the word "establish" means simply, as has been argued by great constitutional lawyers in the early history of this country, to "point out," then the Constitution, if that be the true meaning of this section, has been violated hundreds of times by the building of post offices. Surely it will not be argued that to establish post offices means to erect buildings and to establish post roads means only to point them out.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, it may be proper to say that at this moment 95 per cent of the people of this country will applaud every single Member of this House who casts his vote in favor of the improvement of our national highways, and that for one time you will not be met by your constituents with the frown with which you are usually greeted after a general appropriation bill has been passed appropriating millions of dollars for purposes in which the farmer can see no benefit. Let a Democratic House pass this or a similar bill for the appropriation of money by the Federal Government for the construction of good roads, and it will receive the plaudits of that great class of our citizens who reside in the rural districts of this great country, "Well done, good and faithful servants."

VALUE OF RIGHTS OF WAY.

On a basis of 40-foot width there are 10,431,727 acres of rights of way included in the public roads of the United States.

Based on the average value of farm lands in the various States the total value of these rights of way would amount to $341,899,306.

Adding this to the total value of the improved roads would make a grand total for rights of way and improvements of $895,562,112.

RELATIVE POWER REQUIRED ON GRADES.

On a 5 per cent grade a horse can draw only about one-half as much as on a level.

On a 10 per cent grade a horse can draw only about one-fourth as much as on a level.

It is estimated, however, that a horse can double his usual exertion for a short time and can pull practically as much on a 4 or 5 per cent grade as on a level, provided the hill is not too long. The steepest hill on a road fixes the load which can be drawn to market, and it is quite as important, therefore, to locate the road properly as it is to improve it by surfacing with stone, gravel, or other materials.

EFFECT OF GOOD ROADS UPON INCREASE AND DECREASE OF RURAL POPULATION.

In 25 counties having 40 out of each 100 miles of road improved, average increase in population per county, from 1890 to 1900, 30,000.

In 25 counties having 1½ miles of improved roads to each 100 miles, a decrease of 3,000 to the county for the same period.

NOTE.—Statement of J. E. Pennybacker, jr., Chief of Road Management, Department of Agriculture.

EFFECT OF GOOD ROADS UPON RURAL EDUCATION, 1909.

In five States having a large percentage of improved roads, attendance of enrolled pupils 77.13 per cent.

In five States having low percentage of improved roads, 59.16 per cent.

Out of 24,000,000 children of school age 6,500,000 were not enrolled in our public schools in 1909.

In France one good draft horse is expected to be able to draw 3,300 pounds a distance of 18 miles any day in the year, rain or shine.

Five hundred thousand farm wagons and vehicles are manufactured every year. Bad roads are sending them to the junk pile.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. AKIN].

Mr. AKIN of New York. Mr. Chairman, like the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY], who was very frank and stated that he intended to talk on the agricultural bill, I am going to be just as frank and say I am not.

In the Washington Herald there was printed a statement, or a pretty little romantic story, entitled "Statesmen, real and near," on February 27, 1912. It is a very pretty little story, indeed, and I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to be allowed to incorporate it in my remarks without reading it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the extract referred to:

STATESMEN, REAL AND NEAR.

By Fred C. Kelly.

We approach now the tale of the innocent personal that made the country editor a multimillionaire.

Congressman GEORGE WINTHROP FAIRCHILD, who represents the Catskill Mountain district of New York, says, chivalrously, that whatever success he has made in life has been inspired by his wife, which remark gives one sufficient excuse to tell the jolly little romance in the life of the Catskill Congressman.

FAIRCHILD left school when he was 14 to become a printer's devil on a weekly paper in Oneonta, N. Y. He was a painstaking devil, and grew up to be a good printer. Time went on, and after following his trade in various cities he drifted back to Oneonta and bought the little paper where he had first started to work. As a matter of fact, he didn't drift back to the old home, but simply went there; however, as the drifting idea has the call in romantic tales like this, let it stand. Anyhow, FAIRCHILD acquired the Oneonta weekly and was its editor. He toiled diligently, recording such things as interest the readers of country weeklies. If Aunt Annie Shields was "quite poorly," FAIRCHILD said so in his column of personals. If a man, acting on the every-one-his-own-press-agent theory, brought in the longest ear of corn and gave it to the editor, he was sure of publicity.

One day FAIRCHILD noticed in the New York paper that a beautiful and talented New York girl, then visiting relatives in Oneonta, had inherited a fortune of more than $100,000. He wrote a nice little personal about it, saying, among other things:

"She has often visited in our midst and is favorably spoken of by our young people, who will be greatly pleased to learn of her good fortune in coming by so much money. We hope she is the kind that will not let wealth turn her head."

The day after the paper was issued a trig young woman, dressed in the latest New York style, came into FAIRCHILD's office and said she wished to buy six copies of the paper. She looked through a copy to make sure it was the issue containing the item she was after, and FAIRCHILD noticed that she was reading about the New York heiress.

"You're not the girl that inherited all that money, are you?" he made bold to inquire.

"Yes," said the beautiful customer, "I'm afraid I am."

"Well," observed FAIRCHILD, "I guess we all like to see our names in the paper."

The remark greatly incensed the young woman.

"I hope you don't think I'm pleased about having my name in a dinky, little crossroads paper like this!" she retorted. "I'm buying these copies because I thought my friends in New York would enjoy the joke on me—being written up in this absurd rural style."

"Oh, you needn't try to let on that you are not tickled over being written up," came back FAIRCHILD. "You're probably just as glad to see your name in print as anybody, and I don't care if you are from New York."

And the beautiful young woman walked out of FAIRCHILD's office in a huff. Later on he was formally introduced to her in a social gathering in Oneonta, and once more they argued whether she was pleased or merely amused over the item in the paper.

FAIRCHILD was the only young man in Oneonta who had the temerity to talk back to a young woman with so much money in her own right. Of course, they fell in love and were married.

With their combined capital FAIRCHILD built up a vast manufacturing business, and he is to-day worth probably a dozen millions.

But Mrs. Fairchild still insists that she was considerably annoyed over the "piece" in the paper, and her husband still asserts that she was pleased beyond measure.

Mr. AKIN of New York. Mr. Speaker, I am going to offer $100 reward for the arrest and conviction of any postmaster interfering with or destroying any mail matter sent out by me to any constituents in my district while I am a Member of Congress.

Dr. Grandfield, First Assistant Postmaster General, evidently makes the attempt to leave the impression that the International Time Recording Co. has no relation to the company whose president in 1903 was indicted along with many others charged with conspiring to defraud the United States in relation to the supplying of the Post Office Department with time clocks or recorders for the use of clerks and carriers in keeping account of their time.

Dr. Grandfield says:

" * * * between 1898 and 1903 a large number of recorders, known as the Bundy time clock, were purchased. During the investigation of the postal service in 1903 the purchase of these time recorders was discontinued because of the disclosures resulting from the investigation, the president of the company and the superintendent of the Salary and Allowance Division being indicted for conspiracy to defraud the United States. Consequently no recorders of any kind were purchased between 1903 and 1909.

He says further:

" * * * it was necessary to have a committee of high officials outside of the bureaus of the department because of the scandal connected with the purchase of recorders under the former contract.

A committee of postmasters, consisting of David C. Owen, of Milwaukee, Wis.; Harry Bacharach, of Atlantic City, N. J.; and George W. Bean, of Tampa, Fla., were appointed. These men traveled about for some weeks, and their daily subsistence expenses were so high that that auditor balked at paying them, but finally, under direction of Postmaster General Hitchcock, they were paid. These expenses aggregated almost $2,000, and they rarely had breakfast for less than $2 up, and the standing rule of the department "that lodging and board at hotels shall be at a rate not greater than $5 per day" was waived for their benefit. Grandfield says the committee reported in favor of the Hawley and International models, and that it was found that the International clock could be had at $150 each, and they would allow a rebate of $25 on old Bundy clocks turned in.

The Bundy clocks, which were the occasion of the indictments of officials and officers of the company, were undoubtedly as costly to make as the latter model bought from the International Co., and the highest price ever paid for the old style, with the large number of keys at 50 cents each, was $122.

The Bundy Co. was, in 1903, and is yet owned by the International Co., so the significance of the naïve remark of Dr. Grandfield, that the International Co. allows $25 credit on Bundy clocks turned in on the new purchases, becomes apparent.

G. W. FAIRCHILD, a Member of the Sixty-second Congress, is president of the International Time Recording Co., according to its latest reports available.

Up to the time of the Bristow report in 1903 there had been purchased 1,743 of the Bundy clocks. H. E. Bundy was, in 1903, and is yet the treasurer and general manager of the International Time Recording Co. George E. Green was then the president and is now the first vice president, the president now being GEORGE W. FAIRCHILD.

Green was indicted five times in connection with the recorders and other frauds, but he was not brought to trial until three years later, when on one case the charges were dismissed and he was acquitted on the others. About that time he was, and had been for many years, chairman of the Republican county committee. He has been president of the League of Republican Clubs of New York, and at the time of his indictment was a member of the State Senate of New York, and is now a member of the Reform Club of New York.

The Federal statute protects G. W. FAIRCHILD, as this is an incorporated company.

It is claimed that the W. H. Bundy Recording Co., of Syracuse, N. Y., makes a recorder at half the price or less of what the International is being paid by the Post Office Department, and that this clock, in competition with the International, was recently awarded a contract at a navy yard.

The old "Bundy" clock not made by the W. H. Bundy Co. sold at $122, while the International is now getting $150, and $14 additional for card racks; so the investigation in 1903 does not seem to have counted for much.

A public document gives dates, names, and amounts of money payments to department officials at that time in connection with the business with the International Co., the company which is still doing business at the same stand.

The International Co. claims more than two millions of assets, of which more than one-half is plants, trade-marks, and "good will," and it owns or controls the following companies, once independent: Bundy Manufacturing Co., Willard & Frick Co., Standard Time Stamp Co., Chicago Time Register Co., Dey Time Register Co., Syracuse Time Recorder Co.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. AKIN] is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. AKIN of New York. Moody's Manual of 1903 shows GEORGE W. FAIRCHILD was a director of the International Time Recorder Co., of Binghamton, N. Y. It shows that he was a director in 1904, and the same authority in 1905 shows that he was first vice president and director of the International Time Recorder Co.

Page 1027 of Poor's Manual of Industrials:

International Time Recorder Co. of New York, incorporated in 1907 under the laws of New York, as successors to the New Jersey company, organized April 7, 1900; manufacturers of time recorders and time-stamping devices. They absorbed the Bundy Manufacturing Co., the Willard Frick Co., the Standard Time Stamp Co., Chicago Time Register Co., Dey Time Register Co., and the Syracuse Time Recorder Co., the plant being at Endicott, N. Y. Directors and officers: G. W. FAIRCHILD, president; C. E. Greene, first vice president; J. L. Willard, second vice president; A. W. Ford, secretary; H. E. Bundy, treasurer and general manager.

Now, Mr. Chairman, these are several instances of the abuses against the rules and regulations of the departments. The postmaster at Gloversville draws two salaries, and he does connive and scheme at all times and is the local head of the Republican organization of Fulton County.

In the early spring, Mr. Chairman, in conversation with Mr. Hitchcock, Postmaster General of the United States, he did inform me that by instructions from the President of the United States I should be made the referee in regard to all Federal appointments in my district; and to prove that fact I ask permission to insert in the RECORD the following letter from the First Assistant Postmaster General's office, asking me to make a suggestion as to the betterment of the service at North Creek, N. Y., for the reason that the postmaster was not attending to his business—in fact, paid no attention to his business—and I did suggest the name of a proper man to fill the said office.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to insert this letter in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Following is the letter referred to:

Hon. THERON AKIN,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR SIR: The post office at North Creek, N. Y., will be advanced from the fourth to the third class July 1, 1911, necessitating the appointment of a postmaster by the President. When last inspected this office appeared to be in a satisfactory condition, except that the postmaster, Lee Waddell, was not devoting sufficient personal attention to his duties as required by the postal regulations. The department will be pleased to receive as promptly as possible an expression of your views as to what action in this case will be for the best interests of the service.

Very truly, yours,

E. T. BUSHNELL,
Acting First Assistant Postmaster General.

Mr. AKIN of New York. Several days after this nomination was made by myself I was called to the White House by Mr. Taft in regard to it. As I entered into the presence of the said President of the United States, William H. Taft, he informed me that the senior Senator from New York—a particular friend of Bill Barnes, Lucius N. Littauer, Lou Emerson, Johnny Alds, and the $4,500 lame-duck internal-revenue collector at Albany, the beach combers, thimble-riggers, and trimmers who constitute the Republican organization in my district—had told him that I was a Democrat. [Laughter.] My answer to him I would not care to have printed. I have paid no further attention to the matter, except to understand or find out that the same old postmaster had been reappointed and that he was farming the office out to a crooked Democrat; and it was a well-known fact that this crooked Democrat, this same man, has been credited with entering into a dead woman's premises and abstracting from her private desk evidences of debt to the amount of $14,000 which he personally was under obligations to pay, and the whereabouts of said papers or evidence of debt no person has ever been able to discover.

Complaints have come to me, Mr. Chairman, of men unfit to hold office as postmasters, one of whom has been accused of kicking the money bag under the radiator during the investigation of an inspector shortly after a robbery of said post office, saying, "This is where we make good for a former robbery"; and that man is still in office.

Another postmaster at St. Johnsville, who was appointed during the term of Roosevelt, the Postmaster General was notified of by the authorities at St. Johnsville, N. Y., in their remonstrance against the appointment of said postmaster, that he was not a fit person to hold said office for the following reasons: The report in the department at Washington should say that, in regard to this postmaster, in July or August, 1908, Mr. Henry Carroll, of St. Johnsville, N. Y., forwarded to President Roosevelt a sworn affidavit made by W. Earl Yoker, which tended to show the dishonesty of a man, Timothy Dinneen, in fraudulently using money belonging to the county of Montgomery, State of New York. This letter was replied to by President Roosevelt, stating that the matter had been referred to the Postmaster General, and a reply was received from the Third Assistant Postmaster General acknowledging receipt of the same.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN], and ask that he use the balance of his time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. AKIN of New York. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman if the balance of the manuscript which the gentleman wishes to print contains any reflection on a Member of the House? I wish to call his attention to the fact that he has already—innocently, I imagine—transcended the rules of the House by mentioning the names of the Members of the House. I do not think in extending his remarks he wishes to violate the rules of the House.

Mr. AKIN of New York. If the gentleman wishes to object to my extending my remarks in the Record, I will use my rod in pickle. I do not think it says anything more about the names of any Members. I can not say unless I read it over.

Mr. OLMSTED. I have no objection, but I wished to call the gentleman's attention to the matter, so that he would not violate the rule.

Mr. AKIN of New York. No; I would not violate the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman has already been granted leave to extend remarks in the Record, which, of course, must be done in accordance with the rule.

Mr. MANN. May I ask when that leave was granted?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asked leave to extend his remarks by the insertion of certain papers, which leave was granted. The Chair understands that the matter inserted must conform to the rules of the House.

Mr. MANN. As I understood, the request was only for the insertion of papers. Now he makes the other request.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman asked leave only for the insertion of certain papers.

Mr. AKIN of New York. I ask unanimous consent that I be allowed to correct, revise, and extend my remarks, and I am very certain that there are no more remarks in regard to any Member.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the gentleman's request at this time?

Mr. AKIN of New York. I ask unanimous consent to revise, correct, and extend my remarks. I have some letters and data which I wish to incorporate in my speech, which I have not had time to read, and would not have time to read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman has been granted leave to insert certain letters which he mentions or referred to in general terms. Now, his request is for unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the Record. Is that the request?

Mr. AKIN of New York. That is the request.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I should like to reserve the right to object.

Mr. MANN. The Chair has not recently put a request to "revise" remarks in the Record. The ordinary revision of course goes without saying, but under leave to revise, a man may take out entirely what he says on the floor.

Mr. AKIN of New York. You need not be alarmed. I will not take anything out.

Mr. MANN. I am not talking to the gentleman from New York; but I gave notice some time ago, where Members asked leave to extend remarks in the Record, that it was a different proposition from leave to revise. And I did not understand that the gentleman asked leave to revise his remarks. Now, may I ask the gentleman whether, in extending his remarks in the Record, it is his purpose to continue an assault, or whatever it may be termed, upon officeholders or other people in the United States who have no opportunity to be heard here?

Mr. AKIN of New York. If they were here attending to their business they would be all right.

Mr. MANN. I am asking about men who are not Members of the House. It seems to me, ordinarily, where opportunity is given for Members to make speeches, speeches that make assaults upon individuals, ought usually at least to be made in the House where people can hear them. I shall not object to the request of the gentleman, because it is the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I should like to inquire if the gentleman intends to use the name of the Member of Congress that he mentioned in his remarks?

Mr. AKIN of New York. Not any further.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Not any further. Does the gentleman intend to put that in his remarks?

Mr. AKIN of New York. Why, I have simply stated matters of fact.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. It does not make any difference. I ask if the gentleman intends to insert the name of the Member of Congress whom he mentioned in his remarks? If he does, I shall object.

Mr. AKIN of New York. Does the gentleman want to deprive all the rest of the Members of the House of the opportunity to extend remarks in the Record?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I do; when a man makes an attack upon a gentleman with whom I served on a committee for several years, a man whom I believe is of high standing and high character, or any other Member who is not present here, and asks to have his name mentioned in those remarks, I shall object. Unless the gentleman takes out the name of the gentleman to whom he has referred I shall object.

Mr. AKIN of New York. I think I will take a crack at it, all right.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. All right; I shall object.

Mr. AKIN of New York. Well, then, object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 45 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HIGGINS].

Mr. HIGGINS. Mr. Chairman, before continuing with my remarks I ask unanimous consent to insert, where they may occur in what I have to say, certain excerpts from the testimony taken and some other publications.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to insert certain extracts that he mentions. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HIGGINS. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, having noted the absence of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Moss], that I yesterday told him that I proposed to submit to-day a few remarks in answer to the speech he delivered here Tuesday. I desire to make that statement now because I see that he is not present.

I had ventured the hope that the Committee on Expenditures in the Agricultural Department would be able through its deliberations to accomplish some good. But since the recent speech of the gentleman from Indiana, the chairman of the committee, I confess it was a vain delusion.

I had hoped that in the investigation of the expenditure of public money by the Department of Agriculture that politics would not enter, and that it was possible for four Democrats and three Republicans, all in themselves honorable men, to unite in a determination to get at the truth and reach a sound conclusion. But since the speech of the gentleman from Indiana I have been compelled to abandon that hope.

I never was rash enough to imagine that the chairman of a committee of this House would be months in the preparation of a report, sign and submit that report to this House, and then on the floor of the House attack his own child and attempt the destruction of his own creation. But after listening to the speech of the gentleman from Indiana I realize that I presumed altogether too much.

From the gentleman's speech, I conclude that he entered upon the investigation with certain fixed opinions on the subject, and that notwithstanding the evidence taken and his report thereon those opinions remained with him, which he embodies in his speech but not in his report. Such was not the state of mind of other members of your committee.

The time at my disposal will not permit a review of all the testimony, involving about 1,000 pages, taken before your committee last summer. I submit the record in the Wiley investigation as made up in those hearings and hope that I am not indulging in an altogether vain assumption when I ask the membership of this House before reaching a positive opinion to read those hearings and the conclusions signed by all the members of your committee as they are embodied in that report and submitted to this House.

The views of the committee are expressed in the report and not in the speech of the chairman of the committee.

The chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture has given expression on this floor to views held by him and has made such an arraignment of the head of a great department of this Government that were the circumstances of their preparation and utterance different I would gladly ascribe them to the heat of debate and accept them as the flash of the moment rather than as the mature deliberations of the gentleman in a carefully worded speech, made with his full appreciation of its meaning and upon his responsibility as a Member of this House; but I am bound to accept the gentleman's statement as made, and submit some observations on the same subject, which I agree with the gentleman is of vital concern to the American people.

I call upon Representatives, some of whom, as did I, participated in the enactment of the pure-food law, to give the House the benefit of their knowledge and to recall some history in connection with its passage. I had believed that no one would contend that the purpose of the enactment of the pure-food law was of necessity to destroy. No one ought to contend for the autocratic exercise of the almost unlimited power of confiscation, subject to no revision, and make it possible for one man, however able, patriotic, and learned he may be, to set himself up as the final arbiter, subject to no control except the conclusions of his own research and the limitations of his own judgment.

The gentleman from Indiana suggests that if there are amendments to be made to the pure-food law they must be proposed by Congress and not by the Secretary of Agriculture. I challenge the correctness of the gentleman's reasoning. Rather should it be stated that the Executive proposes and Congress disposes. One of the functions of the Secretary is, through proper channels, to recommend to Congress such legislation and matters that he thinks it ought to consider, which body has the sole power of vitalizing those recommendations into law if, in its judgment, it sees fit.

The only meaning to be attached to the recommendations of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture, so far as the Referee Board is concerned, is that its authority be founded upon a statute which clearly defines its powers and limitations, and not upon the blanket provision of either Thirty-fourth Statutes at Large, section 1280, or in section 161 of the General Statutes, on which its authority now rests. I am free to say that I would have this recommendation applied to all the departments of the Government. I would not give the Executive of this Nation, whoever he might be, nor to the heads of the departments, the power to legislate, except in very extreme and unusual instances. This is not one of those extreme and unusual instances.

The departments now have such power in many cases. They have long had such power conferred upon them by Congress. This practice is founded on a wrong principle. It gives power to the executive branch of the Government which the Constitution never intended it to exercise. It is an improper delegation of power by Congress. These are the controlling reasons which prompted some members of your committee, and I have, until the gentleman's speech, supposed all members, to make a recommendation that the authority for the Referee Board be founded upon a statute defining its power and prescribing its duties. Your committee found, as a matter of law, that the Referee Board as at present constituted was legally created. The statement of the Secretary of Agriculture as to why it was created, which appears on page 5 of the report of your committee, is, to my mind, a sufficient reason for its continuance until the wisdom of Congress evolves a better organization founded, however, on the same principle. If the existence of the Referee Board, in the language of the gentleman from Indiana, is a "toning down" of the pure-food law, then it is toned down to that extent and it ought to be toned down, and ample reasons exist why it should be toned down.

But let us see what the functions of this board are and who constitute it, and I will leave to other gentlemen as familiar or more so than I to discuss the necessity for its creation and the continuance of this or some other scientific research board. The pure-food law was passed in the Fifty-ninth Congress, and that bill as it left the House provided for the appointment of a referee board, and I will insert here as a part of my remarks, without reading, the section of that bill which made such provisions, and with it the testimony of Dr. Wiley made to your committee on this subject:

Mr. HIGGINS. Before we get as far as that—of course we will have access to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD anyway—you advised with the committee in the preparation of the bill, upon their request?

Dr. WILEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HIGGINS. And appeared before them to explain your views with reference to the legislation?

Dr. WILEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HIGGINS. And it is not too much to say that the bill was prepared by the committee and reported to the House very much in accord with your own views of such a statute?

Dr. WILEY. I must say that that bill met my approval in almost every particular.

Mr. HIGGINS. You were heartily in accord with the different provisions of the bill as reported?

Dr. WILEY. No; there were a few provisions of the bill as reported that I was not in accord with. One was the permission for the use of preservatives at all.

Mr. HIGGINS. You have spoken of that. Any others?

Dr. WILEY. I did not believe in the proviso which excepted from the action of the law an article with a distinctive name.

Mr. HIGGINS. Any other provisions?

Dr. WILEY. Those are the only two that I was really opposed to that finally got into the bill.

Mr. HIGGINS. That is, the bill as reported to the House from the committee, with the exceptions that you have noted, you were in favor of—it met your hearty approval?

Dr. WILEY. Yes, sir; it does to-day. I think it is a fine law, in spite of those little faults that I have mentioned.

Mr. DAVIS. My question was more particularly directed to your activities in getting the bill into the form of a law.

Mr. HIGGINS. Mr. Davis, do you object if I ask another question in that connection?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir; not at all.

Mr. HIGGINS. Do you recall the provisions of section 9 of the House bill?

Dr. WILEY. I do not know it by sections. What is it about?

Mr. HIGGINS. Sec. 9 [reading]:

"That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture to fix standards of food products when available for the guidance of the officials charged with the administration of food laws and for the information of the courts, and to determine the wholesomeness or unwholesomeness of preservatives and other substances which are or may be added to foods; and to aid him in reaching just decisions in such matters he is authorized to call upon the committee on food standards of the Association of Official Agricultural Chemists and the committee of standards of the Association of State Dairy and Food Departments, and such other experts as he may deem necessary. And upon request made to the Secretary of Agriculture prior to reaching any decision as provided for in this section, by any manufacturer or other person interested, asking for the appointment of a board to determine the wholesomeness or unwholesomeness of any preservative or other substance which is or may be added to foods, and concerning the use of which the person making the request has an interest, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture to appoint a board of disinterested experts, which board shall consist of five members, one of whom shall be an expert toxicologist, one an expert physiological chemist, one an expert bacteriologist, one an expert pathologist, and one an expert pharmacologist, which board shall meet at the city of Washington, D. C., or elsewhere, at the call of the Secretary of Agriculture, and pass upon such questions after proper notice and hearing granted to the person making such request. The compensation of the members of such board shall be fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture."

Dr. WILEY. Now, what is your question?

Mr. HIGGINS. I asked if you recalled that section?

Dr. WILEY. Yes; I recall that.

Mr. HIGGINS. That is not in the law now?

Dr. WILEY. No.

Mr. HIGGINS. But that was in the House bill?

Dr. WILEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HIGGINS. And that contemplated—that is a fair construction of the language I have read—contemplated the appointment of the referee board?

Dr. WILEY. I think it would contemplate a board for that purpose; yes, sir. It specifically provides for it.

Mr. HIGGINS. And you were in favor of that section in the law?

Dr. WILEY. No, sir; I was not, not the last part of it. I was in favor of the first part.

Mr. HIGGINS. I asked you to state what you disapproved of.

Dr. WILEY. I thought you meant the act as it exists to-day.

Mr. HIGGINS. No; I said the bill as reported by the committee to the House.

Dr. WILEY. I misunderstood your question. I disapproved very decidedly of that last provision about a board. But I did approve of that first part of the provision—

Mr. HIGGINS. Did you oppose that provision before the committee?

Dr. WILEY. I do not think it was before the committee. I think it was adopted on the floor; I am not sure about that.

Mr. HEPBURN. It was discussed in the committee.

Dr. WILEY. I was not asked to discuss it before the committee.

Mr. HIGGINS. I asked you particularly with reference to the bill as it left the House committee and was reported to the House, because between the action of the House and Senate and conference the bill as it came from the House committee was changed as a result of the action of Congress.

Dr. WILEY. I would want to change my answer, then, because I referred to the law as it exists to-day. I was not in favor of that, but I do not think that I was ever asked to say anything about that before the committee.

Somewhere between the passage of the bill by the House and its signature by the President this provision was stricken out. Soon after the administration of the law was taken up it became apparent that in order to enforce its provisions in a way to appeal to the judgment of the country and to effect a greater efficiency of administration, that it was necessary to have a board whose character, investigations, and research would be such as to command universal respect. This board, created under the authority of the statutes I have already referred to, was appointed at the direction of President Roosevelt. I differ absolutely from the gentleman from Indiana when he stated that the Referee Board is not founded upon any provision of law. He suggests that this House withhold the appropriation for the board and thereby work its undoing. There are specific provisions of the statute which I have cited and which I have no doubt the gentleman knows that can be repealed and the objects sought by him can be obtained without resorting to the indirect method of refusing an appropriation of $30,000 to accomplish his purpose. This board now consists of Dr. Ira Remsen, president of Johns Hopkins University; Dr. Russell H. Chittenden, of the Sheffield Scientific School of Yale University; Dr. Theobald Smith, of the Harvard Medical School; Dr. John H. Long, of the Northwestern University; and Dr. A. E. Taylor, of the University of California, and no statement from me ought to be necessary to convince any gentleman present either of the high character of these men or their scientific attainments, for nothing that I can say will add to the high place they have already taken and nothing that the gentleman from Indiana chooses to say will detract from their reputations as patriotic, high-minded, and scholarly men, some of whom have world-wide reputations as scientists.

A great deal has been said about benzoate of soda, and if the chairman of the Expenditures Committee did not come from Indiana and was not a member of the legislature that passed the Indiana pure-food law, I doubt exceedingly if he would have felt compelled to take the position he took in his speech. It must be apparent to you gentlemen that with all this smoke about benzoate of soda there must be some fire. Time does not permit me to state some facts that have come to my knowledge about this question or about the reversals of scientific opinions that have been formed on it. One of the questions submitted to the Referee Board was as to whether the use of benzoate of soda as a food preservative was harmful or to what extent it could be used and be harmless. The Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry had reached one conclusion. Scientific men all over the world differed on the subject, and the Referee Board reached a different conclusion than the Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry, and their conclusions were accepted by the Secretary.

Those vested with the discretion in the enforcement of the Indiana pure-food law forbid the use of benzoate of soda. It is also contended that this law forbids the use of any preservative except table salt, saltpeter, cane sugar, and smoke, and that its effect is to keep beet sugar entirely out of that State. The question of the constitutionality of that Indiana law is now in the courts, and one of the issues, if not the principal one, is whether the use of benzoate of soda can be forbidden by the Indiana law and the effect of small doses of this preservative upon the human system. Members of the Referee Board did testify in that case. The Department of Agriculture did pay their ordinary witness fees. They did not receive any fees as experts, and simply told the court what they had found as scientific men, and expressed their opinions as to the effect of benzoate of soda as a food preservative. They stated to the court how they reached their conclusion.

The gentleman from Indiana in one breath makes an appeal for the courts to decide these controverted scientific questions, and then in another would deprive the courts of the benefit of expert opinion. His argument is not only an indictment of those who are admittedly the highest authority on this subject in the land, but an assumption that any court or jury could without expert scientific testimony determine, unaided by others, the effect upon the human system of any food preservative. If, in addition to his other conclusions, he asks this House to accept as a fact from the testimony taken before your committee, that the members of the Referee Board were improperly influenced, their testimony bargained for or controlled in any way, except by a regard for their oath and a high conception of their public duties as scientific men, then I have nothing but pity for the gentleman from Indiana.

My conclusions, Mr. Chairman, are not founded upon a magazine article, even though that magazine be of as high a character as the Outlook, nor upon any controversy that may exist between the preservers of food and the State officials of Indiana. I assume there is no Member of this House, either here or elsewhere, but would decry the food adulterator, condemn the selling of filthy food or food products and insist upon the most vigorous enforcement of all laws, whose purpose is to protect the public from the impositions of those who seek to profit by trafficking in either impure foods or in any sham or pretense of purity where none exists. Indeed, Mr. Chairman, it was in response to such a demand that the pure-food law was enacted by Congress, and in furtherance of that sentiment it has been ably and vigorously enforced by two administrations.

The questions raised by the gentleman's speech go to the enforcement of a law which went on the statute books after a long campaign of education and much agitation, and I freely acknowledge the indebtedness of the country to Dr. Wiley for the part he took in the long campaign which finally led to the enactment of this legislation. And what I may say is not to be regarded as detracting from the eminence which Dr. Wiley has attained as Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry, or from the great public services which he has rendered in exposing those who seek to corrupt our food supplies.

It has been said, Mr. Chairman, that we are a Government of law and not of men, and I take it that this Congress will not assume that the existence of a principle as vital as the purity of our food and food supplies is dependent upon the existence of any one man. To vote against this appropriation now will stop the wheels of progress. It is a step backward. The result will contribute to the gratification of those very food adulterators with whom I join with the gentleman from Indiana in condemning. It is a vote against something and not for something. It will operate to confuse the public mind on this most important question.

The gentleman asked this House to accept one conclusion in his speech, and in his report to accept another. The Secretary of Agriculture, as the head of that department, is primarily responsible for the acts of that department.

Time will not permit of the discussion of all the assertions that the gentleman from Indiana makes in his speech. I ask you to read the report of the committee, and then decide for yourself. In his speech the gentleman from Indiana exalts Dr. Wiley and holds up to ridicule and scorn the president of Johns Hopkins University. He glorifies the Chief Chemist and charges the Secretary of Agriculture with willful assumption of power in defiance of law. His report is silent as to the value of the services of Dr. Wiley and Dr. Remsen, but it does refer to the Secretary of Agriculture in the following terms, which I quote:

Your committee does not question the motives or the sincerity of the Secretary of Agriculture, whose long service as the head of the Department of Agriculture has been of signal service to the American people.

[Applause.]

In the face of his report the gentleman uses this language, which I quote from his speech, and let us see if he now questions the Secretary's "motives" or "sincerity":

And this was done whether in a spirit of irony or through sheer recklessness from the money appropriated by Congress to enforce the pure-food law of the Nation.

Gentlemen of the House, which opinion of the gentleman from Indiana are we to accept; his own report or his statement so recently uttered in his speech? They are absolutely irreconcilable. Either one or the other must fall. The statement that the Secretary of Agriculture has been improperly influenced by corporations or by anyone else is absolutely inconsistent with the statement which the gentleman, as chairman of this Committee on Expenditures, made to this House when he reported to it that he did not question "the motives or the sincerity of the Secretary of Agriculture." What has changed the gentleman's mind? How soon after he had made his report?

Mr. Chairman, I confess to an utter lack of comprehension of the purposes of the gentleman who in a formal report to this House makes one statement and then in his speech makes a contrary one of such a nature as his recent utterance, unless it be a desire to secure a partisan advantage by arraigning the integrity of the very man that he but a short time before gave his official approval of.

In order that this House may get a further insight into this matter I will print as a part of my remarks a statement made to the Secretary of Agriculture by the gentleman from Indiana as chairman of the committee before the examination of the Secretary was commenced, which will be found on page 841 of the hearings:

The CHAIRMAN. Secretary Wilson, before commencing the examination I have a brief statement that I wish to read to go into the record at this point relative to the course of the committee.

Mr. Secretary Wilson, our committee is now engaged in an examination of the expenditures of your department and more particularly of the Bureau of Chemistry. In the course of our work, we have had frequent occasion to apply to you for specific information and it gives me pleasure to say, for incorporation in the record, that every such request has met with a prompt response from you. For this spirit of courtesy and cooperation our committee are under obligations to you and to your assistants. We have requested you to be present in person to-day because we have understood your attitude to be that you desire the most complete examination of every detail of your great department of our Government, and we hold the belief that you will be glad to add anything which is pertinent to our inquiry which is within your personal knowledge. Likewise, it is the wish of our committee to afford every opportunity to develop all the facts which are within our jurisdiction relating to the subject under inquiry. We are inquiring particularly into the alleged illegal appointment of Dr. H. H. Rusby, pharmacognosist, in the Bureau of Chemistry, and the allegations that certain officials of your department conspired together to secure the execution of this alleged illegal appointment by withholding the real terms from you and thus secured your approval through false representations.

We have endeavored to give as free latitude as is possible to those who have appeared as witnesses and keep within our jurisdiction under the rules of the House. It is not intended to demand that you shall answer questions, which, in your judgment, should not be propounded to you or which you prefer, for any good reason, not to answer. We will be glad to have you make as full statements as you wish to make, and yet I think I voice correctly the will of the committee in saying that it will not be regarded as a discourtesy to the committee if you shall indicate that you prefer not to answer any particular question for good reasons.

We recall that in the control of a great department, which has been so rapidly expanding as has the Department of Agriculture, that you have many details which must be left to your subordinates. We wish this statement of yours to be as complete as possible, and if you wish to consult any assistant in your department to inform yourself as to precise data you may need to give the committee you will have the freest liberty to hold such consultations.

Do you care, Mr. Secretary, to make a preliminary statement before Mr. Flood begins the examination?

Secretary WILSON. I desire to state, Mr. Chairman, that I appreciate the kind remarks you have made. There are many things that I might say that might be for your information, but I think, after thanking you for the kind welcome you have given me here and the generous terms on which you propose I shall discuss matters with you, I think it is best just to go straight to business.

Do you want me to present matters, or do you desire to begin by asking me questions?

This House must adopt one view or the other, and the extraordinary statement of the gentleman from Indiana, made in his speech on this subject, must be considered with both his utterances in the committee and in the report which he signed. The solution of this question is not to be secured in this way. The moral character, the personal and official integrity of James Wilson and the members of the Referee Board ought not to be the price for the legislation which the gentleman urges and which I, to a qualified extent, approve of.

The remarks of the gentleman with reference to the workings of the board of food and drug inspection amount to the charge of conspiracy in that department to defeat the purpose of the law, with the Secretary at its head, though the gentleman's report is silent on that subject. If the gentleman now thinks such a conspiracy existed, his duty is plain under his oath, and a remedy awaits the gentleman.

It has long been apparent to those who have followed at all closely the enforcement of the pure-food law that there exists in the country two very widely divergent views. Some trade journals, notably the American Food Journal, takes one view, and the gentleman from Indiana sees fit to refer to the cartoon which appears in the issue of that paper of February 15, but he makes no mention of the part which his committee takes in that cartoon, for that cartoon attaches greater significance to his report than, apparently, the gentleman realizes, for, in point of fact, that journal is undertaking to pay a compliment to the gentleman's committee, even though it did portray them astride fiery steeds, discharging revolvers into the air, but having Dr. Wiley prostrate, roped and tied as a result of the findings of his committee, but not by the Secretary, as the gentleman asserts. The issue of the food journal referred to by the gentleman contains the following article, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

[From the American Food Journal, Feb. 15, 1912.]

A REAL INVESTIGATION OF WILEY.

As investigations seem the order of the day, Congress can perform no greater service for the American people than to investigate the methods and manner in which the pure-food law has been and is being enforced. This would be a public service second to none.

Among other things which Congress would discover would be that Wiley's methods of enforcing the law are, more than all other reasons combined, responsible for the increased cost of living, and this, too, without a corresponding benefit to consumers.

There is too much complaint and soreness on the part of the manufacturing interests of the country not to be some just ground of complaint. Wiley is feared by them in a way in which no honest or impartial official should or would be feared. An investigation would reveal conditions which should not be tolerated for an instant under a republican government.

The reputation of a food manufacturer should be like the reputation of Caesar's wife, and when the cry of "adulteration" is started against him, his business is heavily damaged if not ruined, even though he may be successful in refuting the charges in the courts. Wiley has charge and control of the inspectors; he can launch the charge, through his press bureau, of "dopester" and "adulterator" against any manufacturer, and a contested case means continued publicity with the finger of suspicion pointed at the manufacturer. This means a heavy loss to the manufacturer, no matter how groundless the charges may be. Few businesses can stand it, and that is why hundreds of merchants confess the charge, and get their goods back with the payment of court costs only, or plead guilty and pay a nominal fine rather than contest. Occasionally a judge with more than usual discernment refuses to fine, but suspends sentence, notwithstanding the plea of nolle contendere or the plea of guilty. The cost of defending a charge involving a physiological or therapeutic question runs up into the thousands. It is said that the defense in one important case cost a quarter of a million dollars and Wiley was practically nonsuited, but he had damaged the defendant even if he did not succeed in proving him guilty, and thus accomplished his purpose in part at least.

The pure-food law (section 4) contemplates that after Wiley has made his examination of samples and reached the conclusion that the law has been violated the party charged is entitled to hearing before the Secretary of Agriculture for the purpose of showing some fault or error in Wiley's finding. Thus the power to confirm or reverse the conclusions reached by Wiley is thrown upon the Secretary, and of course he is required to reach some conclusion of fact.

One would naturally suppose that if this hearing was not held by the Secretary himself it would be before some unprejudiced and impartial body; but before the Moss investigation it was before a body of three, two of whom were supposed to be unprejudiced and one prejudiced; because it was he (Wiley) who brought the case and acts as prosecutor. The accused at least had some chance, then, because the jury was only one-third stacked on him; but since the Moss investigation the jury is two-thirds stacked. What a farce the proceeding becomes; and so well recognized is the farce that hearings are now seldom had. Thus provisions in the law which were intended to safeguard the rights of the accused have been converted into a bludgeon against him. And Wiley is now made chief inspector, chief examiner, instigator of the charge, prosecutor, jury, and judge; and if any manufacturer dares cry out against such an unjust condition he is met with the cry from Wiley and the Wiley press: "He is an adulterator and a dopester who is being pinched by the law." And all this power in the hands of a man who says: "I am the spirit and essence of the pure-food law, and without me there would be no law," and who uses the law as his private property for the benefit of his friends and the confusion of his enemies; "for he that is not with me is against me." Isn't it time to investigate how this power is being used, in view of the ground rumbling and general spirit of discontent on the part of the manufacturers? Is it no concern of the Nation to know from whom or what interests Wiley has accepted fees or compensation while he was drawing a salary from the Government?

Is it no concern of the Nation to know how much time he has devoted to earning his salary and how much time he has devoted to private interests?

Is it no concern of the Nation to know whether Wiley is in fact a scientist or an expert, or only a charlatan or a humbug dealing out buncombe to the people?

And above all, is it no concern of the Nation to know whether he is enforcing the law impartially or partially?

Let the manufacturers know that they will not be in danger of reprisals by Wiley and see how the facts will come out. Wiley explained the "honey lie" as "a scientific pleasantry"; and a recent seizure of considerable magnitude which wrought considerable damage, as having been made on "academic grounds."

It is time to put a stop to "scientific pleasantries" and "academic" action, and research chemical work for private interests at Government expense, and the way to do this is to have an investigation which will bring out the facts.

The Moss investigation was not a real investigation of anything other than Wiley's connection with the Rusby contract, and while some other features were touched upon, it never did reach the real meat of the situation. It never even started in to do it.

By all means investigate Wiley.

Mr. HIGGINS. I do not accept or indorse the views expressed in that article just read nor the method employed by that journal to influence public sentiment. Many publications, on the other hand, typify the other extreme, and every utterance and act of our distinguished chemist is magnified to the extent that we have come to believe that there is but one man who stands between us and the food poisoner and adulterator, and in order that no injustice may be done and that the House may view both sides, I will send to the Clerk's desk an article appearing in the Chicago Tribune of December 9, 1911, and ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

[From the Chicago Tribune, Dec. 9, 1911.]

WILEY IN CHICAGO; TALKS PURE FOOD—SARCASM FOR SUPREME COURT AND CONDEMNATION FOR MAKERS OF QUACK MEDICINES—"PANPATH" HIS NEW TERM—HOPES FOR PENDING LEGISLATION; INDORSED BY PHYSICIANS FOR HIS WORK.

Dr. Harvey W. Wiley, chief of the United States Bureau of Chemistry, spoke before the Physicians' Club of Chicago last night on "Pure food and drugs," one of his favorite subjects. The talk followed a dinner in the Hotel Sherman.

Dr. Wiley started with some mild sarcasm for the Supreme Court of the United States and ended with a condemnation of the quack medicine maker. On the way he paid his respects to the expert witness, the too tractable legislator, and various others who happened to get in front of his train of thought, which ran on an 80-mile-an-hour schedule and a clear right of way.

"We had a chance," he said, "to pass a law which would have permanently put out of business the patent-medicine maker who says his remedy will cure everything from corns to consumption. That law barred him from making any claims he could not prove to the satisfaction of a court. When it got to the Supreme Court, they sat on it."

GENTLE IRONY FOR COURT.

"I am not making any criticism of the Supreme Court. But everyone has a right to disagree with its opinions. I, for one, prefer to stand with Justice Hughes, who held that the law should stand. He disagreed, probably, because he had not been on the bench long enough to know better."

"As for the opinion, only a son of Oliver Wendell Holmes could have written it. Maybe he understands it. I don't. All I can make out is that it gives anyone the right to lie about drugs whenever he feels like it."

The head of the Chemistry Bureau paused and allowed his habitual smile to grow wider.

"I was at my country club. That doesn't mean I'm rich. Some one introduced me to Justice Van Deventer."

"Ah," said the justice, "are you the doctor who sees that our foods and drugs are pure?"

"Yes," I answered; "just as far as the Supreme Court will let me." And I believe that if the law comes up again Justice Van Deventer will vote for it.

HAS HOPES FOR AMENDMENTS.

"In the meantime two amendments to the present law are pending in Congress. If they are passed, it will do much to undo the harm which has been done by the Supreme Court's decision. These amendments were introduced on the recommendation of President Taft by two legislators of another party. Everything indicates that they will pass."

"Of course there is always a chance of secret influences being brought to bear. Congressmen are influenced by their constituents much more than is thought—especially their wealthy constituents. And most patent-medicine makers are wealthy."

Mr. HIGGINS. Mr. Chairman, while articles similar to these are continually appearing in the publications of the country I can not believe that Congress will indorse either view or that it wants to put its stamp of approval upon such methods.

I will join with any gentleman in a properly conceived attempt to improve the administration of the pure-food law. The record of accomplishment by the Department of Agriculture is the best answer to the charge of inefficiency. The law became operative January 1, 1907, and up to July 15, 1911, the Secretary has had reported to the Department of Justice 2,765 cases for prosecution. One thousand nine hundred and ninety-two of these were criminal cases and 773 were seizure cases. Of these, 1,400 were decided in favor of the Government and only 33 were adverse to the Government. During the fiscal year 1911, 1,172 cases were sent by the Secretary to the Attorney General and 550 of these were successfully prosecuted during that year. The work of the enforcement of the pure-food law was critically examined by your committee. It showed a zeal both in the preparation and prosecution of cases rarely exceeded by administrative officers. A law of this nature vesting such unusual power to be maintained must be enforced with reason and justice. Any other course will rapidly work either its repeal or emasculation and make impossible of attainment the object sought.

The wisdom of the Fifty-ninth Congress in passing the law is justified by the results secured. It is plainly our duty to strengthen and improve this law and not to hamper and destroy its operation and effect. The country is under obligations to those charged with the duty of enforcing this statute and it has been and is a duty well performed.

Mr. Chairman, I hold no brief for the Secretary of Agriculture. There are those on this floor better acquainted with him personally and officially than I. There are those on both sides of the Chamber who are better qualified than I to testify whether James Wilson has been the tool of corporations, a corrupt administrator of law, has conspired against the public welfare, has knowingly and willfully violated the laws of the land, has perverted the mandates of Congress, and rendered ineffectual a great reform. Your committee, in a unanimous report, found that he had not. [Applause.]

I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] the balance of the time that I have not used.

Mr. CANNON. How much time has the gentleman remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut has 15 minutes remaining.

Mr. CANNON. I think, Mr. Chairman, I do not require more than five minutes. I had no thought of addressing the committee at this time, but the remarks of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HIGGINS] prompt me to say a word. I did not listen to nor have I read the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MOSS]. I do not propose in the remarks I make now to attack Dr. Wiley or to defend him. I want to give just a word about what I know about the enactment of pure-food legislation.

I was Speaker of the House at the time. I believed then that legislation was apt, but I think gentlemen know that with the great multiplication of bills pending before the House the Speaker of the House, if he performs the functions of his office, can give but very little attention to the details of legislation. He is kept quite busy in performing his legitimate functions. But in company substantially with the membership of the House I cooperated with the efforts of the committees of the House, the party of which I was a member then being in the majority.

I do not know, but I apprehend that it is true, that this pure-food legislation was substantially nonpartisan. I recall that while that bill was pending before the committee and before, as I recollect, I was personally attacked in the press as an enemy of pure-food legislation, I had a talk with my colleague, now the minority leader of the House, Mr. MANN, a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and agreed with him that legislation ought to be enacted. We did not talk over matters in detail, but from the standpoint of the necessity for legislation. During that talk I recollect saying to him that bills and reports were multiplying, and I believed this to be of such importance that, if necessary, a time should be set aside for the consideration of a bill by the House. His reply, in substance, was that it might be necessary; that the committee was busy considering the details of the legislation to be recommended and busy about other matters; but that he hoped, while he was not chairman of the committee at that time, but had charge of the pure-food bill, to be able to pass that bill under the rules of the House.

Subsequently, it was passed under the rules of the House. It was prepared with care, no doubt, as the gentleman from Illinois informed me and as I have every reason to believe, after many hearings and much consideration.

Before that bill was passed the then Speaker of the House was vigorously attacked in the columns of the press, especially in the Middle West. I recollect two papers especially—the Indianapolis News and the Chicago Tribune—day by day were unsparing in their denunciations of the then Speaker because he was alleged to be opposed to the legislation, and that, “like a Colossus, he doth bestride,” not the world but the House. I received remonstrances from throughout the country, some of them very severe, no doubt arising from honest people—I assume they were honest—on account of the representations in the newspapers of my supposed position as a Member and as the presiding officer of the House. Threats of assassination were made, or amounting to that, and a great many letters contained all kinds of denunciations. Well, I had by that time become somewhat casehardened. I did not want to come down on the floor of the House and raise the question of personal privilege. I did not believe then and I do not believe now in paying attention to attacks, especially if they are founded in misrepresentation and based upon untruth, because sometimes it happens that by paying no attention to attacks that are made upon you the man who only reads the headlines perhaps forgets it—some may not—by to-morrow or the next day, while if you reply, my observation has been that there are some people who say, “Well, I reckon there is something in that,” and so on and so on. Others will say, “The galled jade doth wince.” That has been my observation through my public life. But the legislation was enacted all the same, and I was curious to know how these attacks originated, and I made inquiry and I was satisfied that they were—I do not say at Dr. Wiley’s instigation, but I became satisfied that the genesis of these attacks was in the press bureau connected with that service in the department. Now, that is a long time ago, I believe in 1906—so the gentleman here says—but it was some time ago; I think, in the Fifty-ninth Congress.

Now, this whole subject of pure-food legislation is very important. It may be that additional legislation is demanded. I am going to listen and learn, because in my duty as a Member of the House and my committee duties, charged in part at least so far as a minority Member can be in helping to prepare important legislation for the consideration of the House, I am not claiming to be an expert upon this subject. I am not thoroughly familiar with the findings of the court. I note in the newspapers, largely in headlines, much of talk. My mind is open. Somebody is misrepresenting—I do not know who that somebody is—and whatever of misrepresentation may be made I do not charge it upon anybody; but I am going, so far as I can during the consideration of bills by the Committee on Agriculture, to try to find out the truth so far as reports and debate will give me the truth, and then I will follow the conclusion to which I come. I do not want to be understood as complaining or kicking of former criticism, nor do I desire in what I have said to try to prejudice, if I had the power, the mind of any Member.

I have approached the consideration of legislation and appropriation without fear, favor, or affection so far as criticism is concerned. I shall not, by speech or otherwise, condemn the Secretary of Agriculture, with whom I had service in the House of Representatives for several terms nearly 40 years ago, and in all those years, in my acquaintance with him, I have never seen anything that would make me doubt his ability upon the one hand or his integrity upon the other [applause], and, Mr. Chairman, adopting the motto of the Speaker of the House and of the State from which he hails, in this condition they have got to “show me.” [Applause.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES].

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may print in the RECORD some remarks upon the policies of the present Chief Executive.

Mr. AKIN of New York. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD certain remarks.

Mr. AKIN of New York. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN].

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I regret that our genial chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture saw fit on the 27th of February, in the House, to make such an ill-tempered and intemperate speech. This is especially true when we consider that all the matters discussed by him were considered in our committee, and it does not appear from the unanimous report of the committee filed in the House that he was able to obtain the support of his own partisans in a majority report reflecting his picturesque and vaguely supported statements. Nor does it appear that he was able to obtain the aid of one of his colleagues. I do not care to advert to that lack of quality which prevented his filing a minority report, but prompted him to join in a majority report, and then, after weeks, in which the report rested unchallenged, make the appropriation for the Remsen Board the excuse for a general scold. This general scold is not entitled to the poor compliment of the friend who said “It was not even founded on facts.” His attack on the Remsen Board sounded like slamming the door upon leaving the room after a discussion.

THE REMSEN BOARD LEGALLY CONSTITUTED.

That the Remsen Board is legally constituted every lawyer on the committee agrees. That is the opinion of the Department of Justice. It has been organized and at work since February 20, 1908, and its legal existence and jurisdiction within the scope of its activities have never been successfully assailed.

That its extended existence should have the sanction of legislative enactment setting forth the scope of its jurisdiction is the opinion of all the committee, but its abolition is not made the alternative to such enactment. In fact, the report does not in any way recommend its discontinuance.

The Remsen Board, as stated by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. Higgins], was organized during a former administration for the purpose of submitting to a board of scientists in whom both producer and consumer, as well as the citizens of the Nation and the world, had confidence. Its membership is made up of Dr. Ira Remsen, of Johns Hopkins University; Dr. Russell H. Chittenden, of Yale University; Dr. Theobald Smith, of Harvard University; Dr. John H. Long, of Northwestern University; and Dr. A. E. Taylor, formerly of the University of California, but now of the University of Pennsylvania. Each is master of his science. Each is a man who hastens to his laboratory but has to be dragged to the platform. They are all Baconians, who discover facts and phenomena and then slowly promulgate principles; men who never seek to announce a principle and then force facts to fit it.

To that board has been referred questions of five great substances, namely, saccharine, benzoate of soda, sulphur dioxide fumes, alum, and copper. The subject matter of debate is as to being deleterious or otherwise. They have made deliveries upon saccharine, benzoate of soda, sulphate of copper, and are considering sulphur dioxide and alum.

The world, with few exceptions, approve their findings. One of the notable exceptions is the distinguished gentleman from Indiana. It appears that he aided in passage of an Indiana statute which condemned benzoate of soda for use in Hoosier stomachs, but which took no exception to the manufacture of foods preserved by the use of benzoate of soda which might, under the law, be shipped into other States for other stomachs to receive. This has preyed upon the gentleman's mind until it "one melancholy burden bore," of benzoate of soda. For this he complains of the testimony given by the members of Remsen Board in support of their own deliberations in an Indiana court. Perhaps the venerable Secretary, so severely criticized by the gentleman, would have gained his favor by discouraging or preventing the giving of legitimate testimony, but even that great price was hardly sufficient to warrant the suppression of truth.

The gentleman's position will scarcely be helped by his indirect assault upon Dr. Wiley and his direct attack upon Secretary Wilson. True his treatment of Dr. Wiley is couched in honeyed phrase and fulsome praise, but well he knows that every statement which he makes of Wiley's alleged wrongs demands an explanation which the committee knows from the record does not favorably reflect upon the eminent bureau chief but which could be traced to his overwork and complex and arduous duties. These weigh upon the exactness of memory, and in isolated cases betray faulty judgment. It is the warranted guess of many that this untimely speech was made as a result of disappointment in the chairman that "these two braw and bonnie Scots," Wiley and Wilson, "Wha aft agreeing and disagreeing, still seek the same weal and would buffet sair the mon wha'd come atween." They are working now in conformity with the law as construed by the Supreme Court—unless the gentleman from Indiana has recently troubled the waters. [Applause.] As to the Secretary's enforcement of the law being wholly administrative, let me say that the Secretary's construction was that placed by the legal advisers of the Government and also by the chairman and members of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture all through the hearings had during the summer. The error was only discovered on the 11th of December, 1911, when the Supreme Court decided that point. So there is really no great excuse for the great spasm of virtue exhibited in berating the Secretary's construction of the law. This fact the committee especially found.

The gentleman from Indiana says that many are afraid of the decisions of the Bureau of Chemistry. Yes, every farmer throughout the Northwest who raises wheat for market and does not raise the extreme northern variety believes that the market value of his product was reduced by the adverse bleaching decree of the Bureau of Chemistry. The farmers of the Northwest do not appreciate being charged as dopesters, nor, having toiled in the fall to prepare the ground and sow the seed, risked the winter's freeze, the chinch bugs' attack, ruin by the Hessian fly, the drought and the flood, unfavorable harvest, and, having weathered all these, each taking its toll, to be required to pay tribute to a Bureau of Chemistry.

Nor yet do those who saw fit to leave their homes in the North and East and move to Missouri, Arkansas, the mountain and the coast States, investing their all, yes, mortgaging their future, to buy land, clear it, set out orchards, watch them for years grow until finally they come to bear. With their ripening fruit so much depended. First a living, next payment to the bankers who had advanced the means, next to pay the mortgage, and about the time of realization comes the Bureau of Chemistry and says: "The old-time method of preserving those fruits won't do. We will not allow you to fill your contracts with the eastern commercial firms. We are going to turn all your fruit into Dead Sea apples, crumbling at the touch." Do you not think that a sentence of bankruptcy about to be imposed on a thousand communities would prompt a careful inquiry and demand an able and impartial tribunal to determine the important fact? Yet an incident such as I depict prompted the organization of the Remsen Board. The scientific world largely believe the decision will be favorable to the use of sulphur dioxide, and yet the gentleman from Indiana takes the venerable Secretary to task for saying to the fruit growers of the West:

Before I blight your hopes and cause your bankruptcy, I will be convinced by a competent tribunal that bankruptcy is what you deserve.

The gentleman from Indiana says the only class which should fear the pure-food law is the crook. The millions of wheat and fruit growers in the North and West are not crooks. Yet they do fear the Bureau of Chemistry and its dominance by any one man, whether he bear the name of Wiley, Doolittle, McCabe, Dunlap, or any other name bandied in our recent examination. They resent the classification as crooks.

The investigations reveal that the large point of difference in the Bureau of Chemistry was that one element insisted that the bureau should be active in preventing deleterious substances from being in drugs, medicine, small food preparations, and the like. The other element insisted on its devoting its time and energy to the larger and more debatable questions of food purity involved in such questions as benzoate of soda, sulphur dioxide, flour bleaching, and so forth. The Secretary favored the former and submitted certain great questions to the referee board. I am inclined to think that the membership of this House, desiring to treat fairly the consumer and producer, will say that the Secretary was right. [Applause.]

Complaint is made that a large number of cases were abated over the protest of Dr. Wiley. If such there were, then no one brought such records before the committee. True, the bureau chief made a general statement that a great many were abated which were similar to other cases that had been successfully prosecuted. But a careful examination of each of the cases cited by the chief revealed the fact that the abatement was made either on account of respondent correcting his label or otherwise conforming to the law, or, mayhap, due to an acquittal on a stronger count or, in many cases, the lapse of three months, a period beyond which prosecutors considered samples to be stale and ineffective in grade.

The facts are that Dr. Wiley could give only two cases where, overruled by his colleagues of the Board of Food and Drugs, he had appealed to the Secretary. See page 762 of the hearings. The first of these was the branding of gluten flour, in which Dr. Wiley appealed and the Secretary, after a due and careful consideration, held with the majority of the board. But the controversy involved there was largely a question of mathematics and the construction of language.

Second. The use of sulphur dioxide fumes. In the latter case the records show that the chief of the bureau did appeal to the Secretary. The Secretary promptly in writing acknowledged the appeal and announced his readiness to hear it. Dr. Wiley never appeared further in the case, but a short time thereafter, to wit, on February 25, 1910, was present in the office of the Secretary of State where were also the French Ambassador and others. It was there agreed that sulphur dioxide fumes should be used in fruits and fruit juices imported until the Remsen Board should announce the result of its investigation. Certainly our pure-food authorities would not exact more from our own citizens than would be demanded of foreigners.

The facts are that the course followed by the Board of Food and Drug Inspection was one that appeals to the experience of any man who ever occupied the office of public prosecutor. The law was to be remedial and not especially punitive. More than that, the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture in the Sixty-first Congress had this matter under consideration for more than a year. The record at the close of their deliberations on December 16, 1910, differed but slightly from what it was at the date investigations were begun by the present committee in 1911.

Speaking of abatement of cases, that committee said:

The matter of abatement of cases by the Board of Food and Drug Inspection under the so-called three months' rule was considered at length by your committee. This rule, as followed by the board, provides that cases which do not involve harmfulness of ingredients in food or do not involve a question of water or of feed, or drugs which take a long time for analysis, are abated if more than three months have elapsed between the time of collection of the samples and the time the case is submitted by the Bureau of Chemistry to the board. The fairness of this procedure arises from the fact that in many of these cases reforms have been instituted and the parties against whom action would be taken have come into conformity with the law in the meantime, and it is felt that an administration of the law which involves prosecution of such people would be more drastic than the simple conserving of the ends of justice warrant. Moreover, in the administration and execution of a new law it is quite necessary that only those prosecutions be undertaken which promise a conviction, and the various United States attorneys complained before the adoption of the rule that they were sadly hampered in their work when the evidence submitted to them was, as they termed it, so stale. The prime object of the food and drug act is the securing of wholesome food and properly labeled drugs for the people at large. The prosecutions involved are merely an incident toward this end and should be directed principally against those offenders who persist in their violations of the law after being fully informed as to its provisions and requirements.

The Department of Agriculture and the Bureau of Chemistry were warranted in accepting, at par and in good faith, the findings and deliverance of this committee in the preceding Congress. The examination and investigation made by that committee must be presumed to have been thorough and exhaustive, especially as it was agreed upon by all the members. I know the character and ability of the membership on both the majority and minority side, and in approving the policy of the department unanimously it should be, so far as this committee is concerned, a fair warrant that neither the department nor bureau would be criticized by the successors of the membership of that committee, especially as the chairman now was one of the members then and the ranking minority member was a member of the majority then.

As the bureau chief's alleged fruitless appeals upon investigation, decreased from several thousand down to simply two, as the gentleman from Indiana's alleged extravagance and maladministration in 1911 is reduced to a basis of his own sanction and approval in 1910, it is a new evidence that sweeping charges of fraud and extravagance, as well as certain extensive claims of economy, are subject to drastic revision downward.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes; if the question is relevant and material. My time is short.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HIGGINS] is on the floor, and I would like to state in his presence and ask him if it is not true that no member of the committee had anything to do with the making of that report so far as preparing it is concerned, except that the chairman came and laid it before the committee, and if it is not the fact that the gentleman speaking protested at that time—

Mr. SLOAN. I will answer that the report contains no minority views and no objections.

Mr. HIGGINS. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MOSS] asked me a question.

Mr. SLOAN. I yielded for a question to be asked me.

Mr. HIGGINS. Mr. Chairman, just a word in answer to the gentleman from Indiana. That report was submitted to the full committee; was considered by the full committee; they read it over, and it was accorded to different members of the committee to make objections as to what it should contain and what it should not contain, and there was not a dissenting voice to the adoption of the report.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Will the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] permit me to make a statement in that connection?

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] has one-half minute remaining.

Mr. SLOAN. Can not the gentleman from Iowa give me three minutes more?

Mr. HAUGEN. I will yield to the gentleman three minutes.

Mr. SLOAN. "Who steals my purse steals trash" was made to do a service for the gentleman from Indiana. Yet before and after that quotation in his speech he unwarrantedly attacked the venerable Secretary of Agriculture. The devil denouncing sin never spoke with more inconsistency than did the gentleman making the slander quotation from Avon's Deathless Bard. I was in the President's room the other day, where a genius had wrought his ideals with aid of color crystal and gold. The effect seemed to be a realization of the artist's dream; yet the custodian told me that a vandal had defaced one of its fairest parts. I saw, too, the matchless canvas upon which a painter had depicted, militant and glorious, an American fleet upon one of her inland seas.

A vandal there had drawn his ruthless knife and rent that picture, which five generations of his kind could not restore. Then I came to this House to see and hear this assault upon the oldest man in the Cabinet, the oldest Cabinet officer in point of service living, the oldest Cabinet officer in point of service living or dead—16 years of continuous service—the most generally loved and respected Cabinet officer from Washington to Taft; and this respect and love include Republican and Democrat, the East, the West, the North, and South. Yet the gentleman from Indiana proceeds to attack his fair name and fame, and this largely for following directions laid down in the Sixty-first Congress by the Committee on Expenditures. That was a strong committee. It included, of Members still in this House, the distinguished gentleman from Virginia, Mr. Flood, the eminent jurist from Missouri, Mr. BOOHER. That report was backed by Hon. EDWIN W. HIGGINS, now the ranking member of the minority. It was, also, by the distinguished chairman, Mr. MOSS, so it might be called Moss-backed. [Applause and laughter.] I do not think any of these gentlemen should repudiate it or even find fault with the Secretary or the Bureau of Chemistry in accepting it as based upon knowledge and good faith.

But the Secretary, hailing, as he does, from Scotland, may readily see, whatever his course might have been in the pure-food law, it would have met the adverse criticism of the gentleman from Indiana. There would probably be an application of the familiar doctrine, "If you can, you can't; if you will, you won't; you will be damned if you do; you will be damned if you don't." The Secretary will be glad that the power of curse or benediction was not delegated to the chairman of expenditures. I dislike to see the chairman join certain others in their assault upon the venerable Secretary. Not that they can really injure him, but they can not fail to annoy. When a boy, I used to hear carrion crows caw, caw, cawing from a safe distance at an aged and burdened eagle, as he poised and soared to his rocky aerie. There he was safe. Men would not harm him, and crows could not annoy. [Applause.] In his elevated place in American regard the Secretary is safe and secure. And I want to say, gentlemen, when the great Secretary has gone and the honors justly due him from a grateful people are in part paid, if the neglected graves of his detractors now in office be covered with dense coating of grass it will be because Secretary Wilson has done much to make two blades grow where only one grew before. [Loud applause.]

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend the remarks which I made to-day in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit a like request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. AKIN of New York. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] is a very dear friend of mine, and a very nice fellow, but I will have to object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will put the question again. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. AKIN of New York. I object.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. AKIN], to whom I was kind enough to yield time this evening, will withdraw that objection.

Mr. AKIN of New York. Take it up with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE], on the other side.

Mr. LAMB. I will suggest to the gentleman from New York that he is not objecting to the remarks of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. AKIN of New York. But the gentleman from Massachusetts objected to mine.

Mr. LAMB. The gentleman does not visit the sins of others on the head of the gentleman from Nebraska, does he?

Mr. BARTLETT. I have been here a good many years, Mr. Chairman, and this is the first time I have ever seen anything of this kind.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. AKIN] to withdraw his objection on his own personal account, if none other.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES].

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, when a man by his labors, study, or experiments has bestowed great benefits upon his fellow men, it is a duty, and ought always to be a pleasure, to acknowledge and publish to the world the blessings to mankind which his efforts have produced. A sense of justice requires this. But at this time I am moved to make some observations on the work of Luther Burbank, a citizen of Santa Rosa, Cal., because in certain quarters there has lately been manifested a desire to belittle this great man and his work.

I fully appreciate the value to the agricultural and horticultural interests of this country of the great work of the Department of Agriculture. I believe that its useful work for those interests has just begun. As a rule the men engaged in this work are broadgauged and incapable of cherishing those small sentiments—envy and jealousy. Generally the men of the department freely and gladly give praise for work done outside of the department where praise is deserved, but a man connected with the Department of Agriculture—I purposely forbear mentioning his name—has seen fit recently to assail Mr. Burbank and to minimize, even to ridicule, his genius and the great work he has done and is still doing to increase the prosperity and happiness of his fellow men.

Mr. Chairman, while the people of the whole country are indebted to Mr. Burbank more than most of them know, the people of California owe him a special debt of gratitude. His efforts have greatly increased their prosperity and wealth. Ninety-five per cent of the plums shipped out of California, for example, are of the varieties originated by Mr. Burbank. Practically all of the potatoes raised and marketed in our State are Burbank seedlings, unquestionably the best potatoes ever produced in the world.

Mr. Burbank's greatness, and the magnitude and the value of his achievements are recognized the world over by men best capable of understanding and appreciating both the man and his work. It is said of him by David Starr Jordan, president of Leland Stanford Junior University, California, that—

Luther Burbank is the greatest originator of new and valuable forms of plant life of this or any other age.

By Dr. L. H. Bailey, professor of botany in Cornell University, New York:

It is an honor to California that Luther Burbank is its citizen. He is all that he has ever been said to be, and more.

By W. Arlee Burpee, of Philadelphia, one of the leading seed men in the United States:

He stands easily at the head of the world's experimentalists in plant life.

By Theodore Roosevelt:

Mr. Burbank is a man who does things that are of much benefit to mankind, and we should do all in our power to help him.

By Hugo De Vries, of Amsterdam, Holland, probably the leading botanist of Europe:

In all Europe there is no one who can even compare with Luther Burbank. The time will come when he will be as well known and as highly cherished in California as he now is among the scientific men of Europe. He is a unique, great genius.

By Prof. E. J. Wickson, dean of the department of agriculture of the University of California:

No other man has given to horticulture so many valuable things as has Luther Burbank.

Although for many years Mr. Burbank was actively engaged in the nursery business, about 10 years ago he sold out his business to devote his entire energies to plant breeding. Mr. Burbank is not engaged in the nursery business now. His interest in his productions ceases when the fruit or flower or vegetable is perfected and its habits fixed, and instead of going on to propagate a large number of them, he prefers to sell the little stock that he may have and devote his time and energies entirely to carrying out his experiments. Consequently he does not realize large returns on any of his novelties. A thousand dollars would be a large price for him to receive for even the best of his work, so that while the work of Mr. Burbank has enriched others and blessed humanity, he himself has received but very scanty remuneration.

Mr. Burbank has put all the money that he receives from his novelties and from his lectures and from his books, as well as all the money he was able to save from his nursery business, amounting altogether to about a quarter of a million dollars, into his work, and has received but a simple livelihood. His habits are plain, and he does not wish for more. There are important experiments, however, the result of many years of labor, now in progress and waiting to be brought into perfection, which may never be completed owing to lack of funds.

The experiments of Mr. Burbank in plant life cover a very broad field, and are the result of nearly 40 years of experimentation. Let me briefly call attention to some of his best-known creations.

BERRIES.

The Primus berry, made from the native California dewberry and the Siberian raspberry. The two were crossed by pollination. Seedlings were raised from the cross, and then followed years of selection. When the work was complete the fruit was found to be unlike either parent in form, color, or taste. There were no abnormalities, flowering was free, fruiting large and natural, the foliage normal. It ripens its main crop at the same time with the strawberries, and long before most of the standard raspberries and blackberries have begun to bloom, and continues more or less all summer. In planting 5,000 seeds of this new berry, every one produced a primus berry with such slight variations as may be observed in any seedlings of any other fixed species. This is absolutely a new species of fruit, the first directly created by man.

The Phenomenal berry was introduced in 1903, and is now a favorite on the Pacific coast, the demand for plants far exceeding the supply. This berry is a cross between the California dewberry and the Cuthbert raspberry.

The Himalaya berry originated 15 years ago at Santa Rosa, by selection from seeds brought from the Himalaya Mountains. This plant bears four times more fruit per plant by weight than any other berry. At the Government experiment station here in Washington a test was made with this berry and all the blackberries and raspberries grown at the station in order to discover which would keep the longest in good condition. This berry kept in good condition 14 days, or fully twice as long as any other berry, and upon the test being repeated the same results were obtained. The delicious flavor of this berry and its wonderful keeping qualities make it the most profitable for shipping.

The Patagonia strawberry: Twenty-five years ago the work of improving the strawberry was commenced on the grounds of Mr. Burbank, at Santa Rosa. All the standard varieties at that time and the wild strawberry of New England, Alaska, Norway, and the far better ones of California were used. Of the new varieties produced none were thought sufficiently improved to replace the best known, and the work was discontinued until five years ago, when one of Mr. Burbank's Chilean collectors sent the seeds of the wild strawberries gathered from both the lofty Cordilleran Mountains, between Chile and Argentina, and from the coast regions of southern South America. Among these wild strawberries were some with unusual qualities, which were crossed with some of our native California berries. No striking or unexpected results were observed until the second generation, when, among the numerous hybrid seedlings, was found this berry, with its distinct flavor, which connoisseurs have pronounced superb. Of the 81,000 plants sold by Mr. Burbank this last season, he has not yet heard from one purchaser who has not been satisfied.

The Thornless blackberry, an exceedingly sweet berry of medium quality, as productive as the average blackberry, and absolutely free from all thorns, so that one may pick up a branch and run it through his hands without the slightest inconvenience.

The White blackberry, a true blackberry, which is a waxen, almost creamy, white, nearly translucent, and with exceedingly small seeds; is a beautiful and delicious berry, very productive, but too soft for shipping purposes.

The Sun berry, commonly called the wonder berry. This berry is a blue berry, especially valuable for cooking purposes, and, according to my judgment, superior to wild blackberries, elderberries, or huckleberries as a pie berry. It grows from seed, on a creeping vine, and is especially adapted to sandy soil. It requires a considerable amount of sun for its proper ripening. It is also especially adapted for gardening and household purposes, and, though most severely attacked by critics, it has more than substantiated all claims that were made for it.

FRUITS.

The plumcot, an absolutely new fruit, unlike any other fruit ever grown on earth before. It has as its base a wild American plum, Japanese plum, and an apricot. This work was originally commenced by experimentation in the crossing of the plum and the almond, but the plum-apricot promising more satisfactory results, the first experiments were discontinued. There are a great number of varieties of this new fruit—sometimes the flesh is yellow, sometimes pink, and sometimes crimson. It has pits sometimes like the apricot and sometimes like the plum. The fruit is highly colored and the flavor is indescribable, being as unique as it is delicious.

The stoneless plum: For many years there was growing in France a tiny plum with only the suggestion of a pit. By breeding this plum with others in order to increase its size, beauty, and flavor, a satisfactory plum has been produced, through which one may cut in any direction with a knife. The pit has disappeared, although there still remains a soft inner core, which is found in the interior of every pit, and which resembles in this plum the seed of an apple, but softer. The work on this plum is not entirely finished, but the results obtained up to the present time are marvelous.

The Burbank plum, introduced 20 years ago and now more generally known and more widely known than any other plum of any name or kind. Although better plums have since been produced by Mr. Burbank, they have not yet supplanted this old well-known favorite.

The Wickson plum, introduced as lately as 1894 and now very widely known and acknowledged to be the best shipping plum known. In 1909, by the vote of the nurserymen and growers of California, it was placed at the head of the list as the most popular of all plums.

The Santa Rosa plum: It received the gold medal at the Lewis and Clark Exposition.

The sugar prune, Grant prune, and the American, Combination, Bartlett, Apple, Sultan, and other plums: In other words, out of 120 or so new varieties of plums introduced during the last 20 years in the United States by various growers, dealers, and nurserymen, 24 are the production of Mr. Luther Burbank; and the value of these 24 varieties may be seen when it is stated that of the plums listed to-day as standard by the leading nurserymen all over the world it will be found that nearly 95 per cent of those introduced since 1890 are the creation of Mr. Burbank.

A visit to the proving grounds of Mr. Burbank at Sebastopol, Cal., will disclose plums of all sizes, of all the colors of the rainbow, of the flavors of the pear, the apricot, and other indescribable but delicious flavors, and many of them with a fragrance more penetrating and delightful than that of most flowers.

The Burbank cherry: The earliest of all large cherries; were bought in 1898 at auction for $15 per 10-pound box in the East, and later at $7.50 per 10-pound box in carload lots. The next year (1909) they were sold in Philadelphia for $31 per 10-pound box. This cherry is not only the best of all early cherries, but will hold its own among cherries of any season.

The Pineapple quince: Introduced in 1899 and acknowledged to be of unequal quality, having a distinct pineapple flavor.

The Opulent peach is widely recognized as the best in quality ever produced.

Besides these fruits, Mr. Burbank has greatly improved large numbers of pears, apples, grapes, and other fruits by selection and breeding.

NUTS.

Chestnuts: Mr. Burbank has produced a chestnut which will bear within 18 months from the time the parent tree is first planted by seed. Some of these rapid-growing chestnuts have been known to bear when they were only six or seven months old. When one considers that the average age of the chestnut tree from the time it is first planted a seed until it comes into bearing is from 10 to 15 years, it will readily be seen how great and valuable is this achievement of Mr. Burbank's. Mr. Burbank has bred a large proportion of burrs off of the chestnut, but he has not thought it advisable to try to entirely remove the burrs, as they are a protection to the nut.

Walnuts: Mr. Burbank produced a walnut with a shell like paper, which could be readily crushed in the hand; but it was found that the shell was so thin that the nuts were totally destroyed by the birds, and Mr. Burbank was obliged to retrace his steps and increase the shell of his walnut before he could place it on the market. Mr. Burbank has also taken the tannin out of the walnut meat, the tannin being a coloring matter in the walnut skin which has a disagreeable flavor. One of his Santa Rosa walnuts, growing on the place of George C. Payne, of Campbell, has for the last 14 years produced an average crop of over 400 pounds—never less than 200 pounds—which have always sold for from 2 to 5 cents per pound more than the so-called Number Ones from southern California. Among the most useful of Mr. Burbank's experiments in walnuts are the production of the Royal and Paradox varieties. These are rapid-growing walnuts and are very valuable commercially for timber purposes. They attain a great size, arriving at maturity in about 15 years; the wood is of good quality and can be used for the finest finishing purposes, and consequently commands a large price in the lumber market.

VEGETABLES.

The Burbank potato: The Burbank potato, the first and foremost of Mr. Burbank's productions, was produced in Massachusetts in 1873, and, though it received little attention at first, it is to-day grown each season by the millions of bushels and is more and more supplanting all the other varieties of potato. If he had never done anything but produce this potato, he would be entitled to the profound gratitude of his countrymen. Although Mr. Burbank has achieved so much with his potato, he has to-day new and superior varieties, some of which are ready to be placed on the market.

The Crimson Winter rhubarb: This rhubarb was rejected by all growers at first because of its new and unique qualities, and was wholly unappreciated, but to-day in warm climates it is generally recognized as the rhubarb par excellence, and it has rightly been named the "mortgage lifter." Fortunes have been made in growing it in California and Florida.

The Giant rhubarb: The last of all Mr. Burbank's rhubarbs just introduced, and which it is predicted will excel the original crimson winter rhubarb 400 per cent. It will outyield any other rhubarb known at least 3 to 1.

Muskmelon: He has a variety of muskmelon which ripens late in the season and is somewhat larger than the ordinary muskmelon, and if picked when ripe will keep like the Hubbard squash—all winter. The flavor of this melon is not at all unlike that of the original muskmelon and is delicious.

Mr. Burbank has also improved corn, tomatoes, melons, and other vegetables almost too numerous to mention.

FLOWERS.

The Shasta daisy: This perhaps is the most widely known of Mr. Burbank's flower creations, and is a cross between the wild field daisy and the Japanese and English daisy. The flowers are from 5 to 7 inches in diameter. There are distinct varieties of these daisies, both fluted and double and single. Because of their great beauty, their hardihood, and their long flowering season, these flowers seem destined to take the place of the chrysanthemum in the public favor.

The Giant Amaryllis: Mr. Burbank took the original Amaryllis, with its flower about 4 inches in diameter, and after 30 years of selection and hybridization has produced a flower averaging from 7 to 8 inches in diameter, sometimes reaching the marvelous growth of 10 inches. In creating a flower as large as this it is necessary to create a plant stocky enough and with a stem sufficiently strong to hold as large a blossom. These flowers range from light scarlet and pale pink to glistening crimson and deep fiery scarlet.

Watsonia hybrids: By crossing and selection Mr. Burbank has produced a large number of these hybrids of new types, new colors, and enormous flowers, both double and single. I was privileged to visit the proving grounds at Sebastopol last year and see these flowers myself, and I doubt very much if any man has ever produced Watsonias so large or so exquisitely colored as these were.

Dahlias: Mr. Burbank has taken the dahlia with its disagreeable odor and replaced it by the odor of the magnolia blossom. It is said that one still evening as Mr. Burbank was walking among his dahlias he detected a faint odor, distinct and agreeable. A search that night failed to reveal the dahlia that was so different from its fellows, but on the succeeding night the keen senses of Mr. Burbank ferreted out this dahlia, and with it as a basis he has produced a dahlia with the sweetness of a magnolia. Mr. Burpee, the seedman of Philadelphia, says that Mr. Burbank's yellow dahlia is the finest in the world.

Burbank rose received a gold medal at the St. Louis Exposition as the best bedding rose.

The Tarrytown canna, which was awarded the gold medal at the Panama-American Exposition as the best and freest flowering canna then in existence. It is to-day a standard and generally acknowledged worthy of the award then made.

The Fragrant calla, the most abundant bloomer and the first and only fragrant calla.

The Crimson poppy: Mr. Burbank has taken the golden California poppy, and by selection has produced a crimson poppy of marvelous beauty, blooming throughout a long season. Perhaps no other single achievement of Mr. Burbank's illustrates his marvelous powers of perception more than the production of this flower. Taking a California poppy, which has the slightest suggestion of crimson, Mr. Burbank, by patient and long-continued selection, has produced and fixed this beautiful crimson poppy. Every season myriads of these may be seen growing around his home, each one differing from the other in the depth of the colors it displays.

The Shirley poppy: Mr. Burbank has done an immense amount of work with the Shirley poppy, looking particularly to producing delicate colors and shades and well-shaped, cuplike flowers, particularly those having crinkley edges. Anyone in cold words can not describe the gorgeousness or delicacy, as the case may be, of these beautiful poppies. I think the prettiest of all the Shirley poppies that I have seen is one with a white center; not a glistening white nor a dead white, but a white subdued with an undertone of some other almost concealed color, and fringing the crinkley edges of its cup-shaped flower an eighth of an inch of pink, which fades away into the white center. Some of these flowers have petals so delicate as to be almost transparent. The greatest novelty among these poppies is one of pure blue, secured by a long series of selections.

SPINELESS CACTUS.

No more important thing has recently occurred in agriculture than the successful production of the rapid-growing, edible, spineless cactus by Luther Burbank. After 16 years of expensive and costly experimentation he has produced a new and most valuable cattle food for the world. Mr. Burbank does not claim to have discovered the spineless cactus. Some varieties of this plant have been known for years, but without exception they have been nonedible by any animal. For many years it has been the custom in Africa, as well as in those parts of America where it abounds, to feed to cattle certain varieties of the prickly pear cactus after the spines have been burned off. This burning, of course, greatly increases the cost of the fodder. The food value of this spiney cactus for stock has been known by cattlemen, who have grown and used it for some years.

Mr. William Sinclair, a successful cattle grower of Texas, writes:

We find it very poor policy to put the slightest limit on the amount of cactus our cows get. The more they can eat the better they thrive and the more milk they give. There is nothing that sets them back more than a shortage of cactus. If we happen to be short of milk the cause is almost invariably traced to the shortage of cactus.

L. Von Tempsky, manager of the Halaakala ranch, Makawao, Maui, Hawaii, says:

On this ranch we have one paddock of 1,200 acres covered very thickly with cactus or prickly pear; there is also a slight growth of Bermuda grass growing. In this paddock are pastured all the year around 400 head of cattle and about 700 hogs. The cattle only get water when it rains; that is, during the months of December and January, the other 10 months they subsist entirely and solely on the fruit and young leaves of the cactus which they help themselves to. It is a remarkable fact that during the dry months of the year we get more fat cattle per cent from that paddock than from any of the others. I consider cattle fed on cactus, like these are, to have as fine flavored beef as any I have tasted in San Francisco or New Zealand.

The following table shows the comparative value of the average cacti, alfalfa hay, and gamma, a typical range grass, according to analyses made by the University of Arizona agricultural experiment station:

In water-free substance.

Description.	Ash.	Protein.	Fiber.	Nitro free ex- tract.	Ether.
Cactus without fruit.....	19.91	6.48	10.22	61.48	1.83
Alfalfa hay.....	5.67	12.74	39.04	41.06	1.49
Gamma grass.....	15.11	6.99	30.31	45.63	1.96

The great desirability of the rapid growing and edible spineless cactus for cattle food has been recognized all over the world. Inspired by the work of Mr. Burbank and by the experiments made by the French Government in Algiers, the United States, through the Department of Agriculture, was several years ago moved to take up the matter of securing spineless cactus. Experts were sent to foreign countries, and the world was searched that a cactus might be found spineless, or nearly spineless, which would have sufficient nutriment to be valuable as a cattle fodder. From the plants so collected the Department of Agriculture has been able to produce a cactus sufficiently free from spines and nutritive enough to be of some value for the cattle business. But to-day, in spite of all its organization and its wealth, the Department of Agriculture has not obtained a cactus that is in any respect the equal of the cactus produced by Mr. Burbank single handed.

Of all stock food, the Burbank Improved Spineless cactus is by far the most prolific. Three to five times as much is produced to the acre as alfalfa; and it is very much the cheapest fodder to plant, harvest, and cultivate, requiring no irrigation, replanting, or storage in barns, as it can be cut any time as needed.

It is adapted to almost any soil where the temperature does not go below 18° above zero, and it will stand a great amount of heat.

By actual test at Los Banos, Cal., it has been found that the milk flow of the cattle fed on the Burbank Improved Spineless cactus very greatly increased—75 per cent—over the amount when fed on dry alfalfa hay. Cactus is the only fodder that furnishes green, succulent feed all the year.

Another source of great value in the Burbank Improved Spineless cactus is its fruit. It yields over 10,000 pounds of fruit per acre. It is a fall and winter fruit of attractive colors—crimson, scarlet, yellow, white, and variegated. It is a sure bearer; a good packer and shipper; very healthful, and of a flavor which many prefer to that of bananas or figs. It contains 8 per cent to 16 per cent of sugar; is a great fattener for hogs and cattle. Poultry also is extremely fond of it.

These make fine jellies, jams, and glacé fruits and can be used for coloring ices, jellies, confectionery, and so forth.

In an experimental way from the Burbank Improved Spineless Cactus paper pulp and wood alcohol have been produced. But the greatest value of Burbank Improved Spineless Cactus will be that it will make highly productive and valuable vast tracts of land now barren because of insufficient rainfall, not only in southern California and Arizona, the natural home of the cactus, but also in South America, Australia, India, Egypt, and elsewhere.

For example, at Los Banos, Cal., on the west side of the San Joaquin Valley, are large tracts of land practically bare and worth but $10 or $15 per acre. The annual rainfall is about 5 or 6 inches per annum, making the land semiarid. On this soil, without irrigation, the Los Banos plantation is producing 120 to 140 tons of cactus per acre in three years, or enough, with a few pounds of chopped straw, bran, or other roughage, to keep four cows per acre all the year. This same land, when so situated that it can be irrigated and planted to alfalfa, keeps about one cow per acre annually and is now selling for $200 per acre. In other words, Burbank Improved Spineless Cactus will give $15-an-acre land a greater earning power than alfalfa on $200-an-acre land.

A visit to the cactus ranch of Mr. Burbank at Los Banos, above referred to, will demonstrate to the most skeptical the great value of this production of Mr. Burbank.

Mr. Burbank himself says: "The Burbank Improved Spineless Cactus is worth more than the Burbank potatoes and all my other productions combined."

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Would it be in order to ask that this very interesting speech of the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] be printed as a public document, so that it will be accessible to everybody?

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee of the Whole would have no such power.

Mr. MANN. How much time have I, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] has 25 minutes remaining, which he has yielded to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. I have no desire to consume that much time.

Mr. HAUGEN. Then I will yield back to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB] whatever time is left after the gentleman from Illinois concludes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, on February 22 the distinguished gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK], a very warm, personal friend of mine, made this statement:

Mr. Speaker, I have been a Member of this House for nearly seven years. Until the convening of this Congress this House was in the control of the Republican Party. Every year I have seen some Democratic rise on this floor and ask for the reading of George Washington's farewell address, which request was denied by the Republican majority. I now move, in a Democratic House, that the Clerk of the House read that address to the House.

The motion of the gentleman was submitted in the form of a request for unanimous consent, it not being a privileged motion, and was agreed to, and the farewell address of President Washington was read.

The gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] is usually very accurate in his statements, but I think it proper to call the attention of the House to the fact that on this occasion the gentleman was mistaken, and that his innuendo or insinuation leveled at the Republicans was misplaced and not justified by the facts.

Last year I made a request for unanimous consent, which was granted, that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] might have an opportunity to deliver an address upon George Washington, and he did deliver an address which was replete with information, suggestion, and praise. Two years ago, on the 22d of February, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NYE] delivered in the House a splendid eulogy on George Washington. Three years ago the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTWELL], my colleague, read in the House George Washington's Farewell Address; and not only that, but on the 12th of February he read Lincoln's Gettysburg address, which I hope some time will be read on the suggestion of some gentleman on the Democratic side of the House. [Applause.]

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. MANN. For several years prior to that no request was made on either side of the House for the reading of George Washington's Farewell Address, either by a Democrat or by a Republican, and hence no Republican objected to it.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. MANN. Just a moment.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I will in a moment. Will the gentleman possess his soul in patience?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I just want to ask a question.

Mr. MANN. I prefer to make a consecutive statement. It sounds better and reads better. A few years ago the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. WILLIAMS, then the minority leader, did make a motion in the House that the Farewell Address of George Washington be read, and that the House adjourn out of respect to the memory of George Washington.

That motion was defeated by the Republicans in the House, as the motion on last February 22, to adjourn out of respect to the memory of George Washington, was defeated on the Democratic side of the House, I might explain, because I voted against the motion to adjourn on both occasions, believing that the highest respect that we can pay to any departed statesman is to attend to the business which the country has confided to us. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now I will yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I wanted my friend to have the record absolutely correct.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the record as I have stated it is absolutely correct. I am not like my friend from Florida, making statements without a clear recollection of the facts.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will my friend from Illinois say that in 1899, when Mr. Boutell read the address, it was not on the motion of Mr. CLARK of Missouri, the present honored Speaker of the House?

Mr. MANN. I would make that statement if it was true.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Was it not true?

Mr. MANN. Pardon me, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] asked unanimous consent at that time that Mr. Boutell should read the address. He did not make the motion because he knew, although his namesake from Florida does not know, apparently, that a motion was not in order.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I want to say that last year the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BOEHNE] did make the motion that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] should read the address of George Washington, and that was voted down; and in 1907 and 1908 absolutely no notice was taken of the occurrence at all.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman ought to have informed himself the other day before he made the statement in order to give the correct history of it. The gentleman now, after I called his attention to it, since his speech, has informed himself, and he is now endeavoring to give me the information. I had it before. [Laughter.] I do not rely on the gentleman to give me information. My memory gave me the information, and if I had heard the request of the gentleman the other day, made as it was in a low tone of voice in one remote corner of the Chamber, I would have corrected him at the time the Speaker put the request. I heard the Speaker put the request, but I did not hear the remarks of the gentleman. I know the gentleman well enough to know that he does not desire any statement to come from him and remain in the record without correction unless it is absolutely according to the facts. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, there has been some discussion here in reference to the pure-food law. I am going to take a moment or two, if I can, to speak on that subject. The pure-food bill, the one that became a law, was a Senate bill. The House had passed in prior Congresses pure-food bills at different times, and a great many bills had been introduced. In the Fifty-ninth Congress, at the beginning of the session, the Senate passed Senate bill 88, the pure-food bill. It came to the House and went before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, of which I was a member. That committee selected me to take active charge of the bill, both in committee and on the floor, and I was afterwards one of the conferees.

I have read with considerable interest the unanimous report of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture concerning what they referred to as the "Wiley investigation." I have a very high regard for the members of that committee, although I have regretted that no member of that committee, either on the majority or the minority side, was familiar at all with the passage of that bill through Congress.

There are many suggestions in this report, agreed to by both the majority and the minority, which in my judgment are not entirely warranted by the facts in regard to the pure-food law. The matter becomes more or less acute in connection with the so-called Remsen Board. I was one of the Members of the House when the pure-food bill was under consideration—and I think that that was practically the unanimous opinion—who were unwilling to leave to any one official of the Government a determination either as to the standard of food or as to the prosecutions for the violations of the law, and it was never intended, and the law does not so provide, that Dr. Wiley or anyone else at the head of the Bureau of Chemistry shall have the final say as to prosecutions for violations of the law.

Dr. Wiley, Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry, is a particular friend of mine. He was of great service in the agitation which led to the passage of the pure-food law, and of great service in the preparation and consideration of the pure-food bill. Secretary Wilson, I am happy to say, is also a particular friend of mine, in whom I have absolute confidence as to his integrity and his capacity. [Applause.] I have regretted on many occasions that in the execution of the pure-food law there had arisen more or less controversy and conflict in the department, and yet it was perfectly apparent to anyone who had made a study of this subject in the manner in which I had endeavored to do that it was almost inevitable that in putting a law on the statute books affecting all of the food and drugs which are manufactured and sold throughout the United States, necessarily general in language, it would lead to more or less controversy and division of opinion.

The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HIGGINS] a few moments ago said that the pure-food bill as it passed the House contained a provision authorizing the appointment of a board allied or akin to the Remsen Board, and that somewhere it was dropped out. The bill as it passed the Senate contained no provision of that kind. The bill as it passed the House did contain a provision authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to have certain powers in reference to fixing standards of food, and the appointment of a board of experts, in addition to obtaining information from the Board of Agricultural Chemists. That was stricken out in conference, and, in my opinion, as I recollect it, went out, partly at least, because, as I stated on the floor of the House when the conference report was under consideration, under the very terms of the law as it would exist the Department of Agriculture would have the authority and would be expected to exercise that authority and employ experts to help in determining whether they would begin prosecutions for the violation of the law.

We can readily see that under the pure-food law neither the Remsen Board of the Agricultural Department nor the Agricultural Department would have the final determination as to whether there had been a violation of the law, as to whether there was deleterious substance contained in the food, which is the usual controversy now.

We did not leave that to the administrative or the executive branch of the Government. That is left for the court to determine. It can only be determined as time goes on, as we become more and more informed through the expert and learned men who study the subject, and through the decisions of the court which examines and hears these experts in their lines. We left to the determination of the Agricultural Department, the Bureau of Chemistry, controlled by the Secretary of Agriculture, the determination as to certain facts, whether there was a violation of the pure-food law, and then for them to determine as far as they were concerned whether to commence a prosecution in court.

No one would advocate, I think, that power be given to one person in the country to commence prosecutions ad libitum where there was a controversy as to whether the prosecution should be commenced at all. The Remsen Board and the Bureau of Chemistry in the Agricultural Department are only advisory as to whether the Government should attempt the prosecutions.

When the pure-food bill was passed I went to Dr. Wiley and the Secretary of Agriculture, and said to them that the pure-food law was passed for the purpose of curing the evils in regard to foods and drugs. It was not passed for the purpose of injuring people in the trade who were willing to conform to the law; that it was not passed for the purpose of prosecuting or penalizing people who may now be violating the provisions of the law if they were willing to correct their methods when it was called to their attention. I said to them that they had not determined as to the larger portion of the foods and drugs just what would be a violation of the law, and before they commenced prosecution it was their duty to notify people so that without prosecution they might correct the evil which they were committing and comply with the provisions of the law. I believe that should be, and I believe it has been, the policy of the Department of Agriculture both of Secretary Wilson and of Dr. Wiley.

Mr. Chairman, one more word, called out by the statement of my distinguished colleague the former Speaker of the House [Mr. CANNON]. When the pure-food bill was placed in my charge by Col. Hepburn, then chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and by that committee, I talked with the Speaker in regard to it and the possibilities and probabilities of getting it up for consideration. I did not desire to have that bill considered under a rule which would cut off debate or which would limit amendment. As we all know, at this season of the year appropriation bills naturally have the right of way.

Certain gentlemen throughout the country, who have no conception of legislation in the House of Representatives, but only see the one thing that they are specially interested in, became impatient and assaulted the Speaker because the pure-food bill was not promptly passed, although during that time, and I made the statement upon the floor of the House before, the Speaker had said to me that so far as lay within his power he would exercise his influence to see that the pure-food bill could be called up and considered at any time when I said I thought it ought to be, he having confidence enough in my judgment to believe that I would not ask to have the bill called up at a time when under the legislative procedure of the House it ought not to have been called up. Subsequently the bill was considered under a rule which only provided that it should be in order to consider it from time to time without any limitation of debate or amendment, and the assaults which were then made upon Mr. CANNON, my colleague, were absolutely unjustified, without any basis of fact behind them, though, so far as I am concerned, I have believed that usually, if not always, the criticisms of the former Speaker were without sufficient foundation to warrant criticism at all. I know that during the time between when that bill was reported and the time it was considered I had absolute confidence that that session of Congress would not end until the pure-food bill had been considered and passed by this House, and hoped that it would be agreed to in conference and become a law. [Applause.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield back my time to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB].

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks made this afternoon.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. AKIN of New York. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, we have finished with general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say that general debate on this bill is now closed, and the Clerk will read the bill under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read the bill down to line 3, page 2.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the language, "Solicitor, $5,000," line 2, page 2. I do not want to lose any rights.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that his point of order will be in order at the close of the paragraph.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I would like to make a parliamentary inquiry as to where the paragraph will end.

The CHAIRMAN. Line 9, page 4.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, is this a private conversation—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida submitted a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I made a point of order, and the Chair ruled that I would have to wait until the end of the paragraph, and then I wanted to ascertain where was the end of the paragraph, and the Chairman was telling me. That is all.

Mr. MANN. All the gentleman had to do was to turn over the page and see it.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a point of order on the second page, line 2, against the words "Solicitor, $5,000," and also, beginning in line 12, against the words "one inspector"—

Mr. LAMB. Will my friend just take these items by piecemeal and give them to us one at a time?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. If that is satisfactory, but I did not want to lose any rights and I thought I had better state them all, and then we can discuss them separately, if it is desirable. The next place is, beginning with the words "one inspector," in line 12, down to and including the word "each," in line 18. In line 22 the words "six clerks." Beginning with the word "one," on page 3, in line 8, "one construction inspector, $1,400; two cabinetmakers or carpenters, at $1,100 each." Then, beginning again in line 12, with the language "three cabinetmakers or carpenters, at $1,020 each"; in line 15, "seven carpenters, at $900 each"; in lines 20 and 21, "one plumber, at $1,020." On page 4, line 1, "three mechanics, at $1,200 each; one mechanic, $1,100." I make the point of order against those several phrases or sentences of words because they are not provided for by existing law.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to reserve a point of order upon the paragraph.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I challenge the point of order on the solicitor, and we will take the paragraph up in detail if my friend agrees to that. Some of these may be subject to a point of order, but we know the solicitor is not. Will the gentleman say what he believes in the case of the solicitor so that we can read the law and the authority?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. If the chairman of the committee will advise me as to the law authorizing the employment of a solicitor, and that there is such a law, it will simplify and, indeed, it will settle the whole matter. My information is that there is no such law. On the contrary, this matter has simply grown up by appropriation; that there is no statute, and never has been any statute, especially providing for the office of solicitor in the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. LAMB. We heard something about that, and we are prepared. We have the law here, and I will ask my colleague from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] to please state it.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Let us see it.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I do not think there is any doubt that the point of order made by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] against the office of the solicitor is not well taken. On the contrary, I think there is ample authority in law to provide for this appropriation and for this place. It is true that the office of the solicitor has not been created by any specific act of Congress as other solicitors have been created in some other departments of the Government. But this is true; it provides that the Secretary of Agriculture, under section 523 of the Revised Statutes, after enumerating other things that the Secretary may do:

That the Secretary shall have authority to appoint such other employees as Congress may from time to time provide, with salaries corresponding to the salaries of similar officers in other departments of the Government.

In addition to that, Mr. Chairman, the appropriation act of May 26, 1910 (36 Stats., 416), provides:

And hereafter the legal work of the Department of Agriculture shall be performed under the supervision of the solicitor.

It seems that, under section 523 of the Revised Statutes, the Secretary of Agriculture was undoubtedly given the authority to appoint such an official as the solicitor. But even waiving the authority in that section, I am confident still that the Secretary has authority given him in the appropriation act of 1910, namely:

Hereafter the legal work of the Department of Agriculture shall be performed under the supervision of the solicitor.

This, I take it, is express authority under which the Secretary can appoint this solicitor.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman claims that it is legislation, and not appropriation, that created the solicitor, and that directed how this work should be done.

Mr. LEVER. That is my opinion, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois—directing the Secretary of Agriculture how this work in the legal department in the future shall be performed.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, the precedents have settled this question beyond any sort of doubt, and I want to call your attention to one or two declarations in the Precedents:

Proposition to increase salaries fixed by law or appropriate for offices not established by law are subject to a point of order.

That is volume 4 of Hinds' Precedents.

Mr. LAMB. There is no trouble about that.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Let me get through.

The mere appropriation for the salary does not thereby create an office so as to justify appropriations in succeeding years.

I do not think there will be any objection to that. And that is found, Mr. Chairman, in volume 4, sections 3670 and 3697, of Hinds' Precedents.

I want to call the chairman's attention to this:

The reenactment from year to year of a law intended to apply during the year of its enactment only does not relieve the provision from the point of order.

That is from section 3832, volume 4, of Hinds' Precedents.

Now, I want to call the attention of the Chair to the statute cited, and I want to insist, Mr. Chairman, that it can not by any sort of reasoning be held to authorize the establishment of the office of solicitor. That statute reads as follows, and it was simply the annual agricultural appropriation bill, making appropriations for the fiscal year, just as this bill undertakes to do, and it had this provision in it:

And hereafter the legal work of the Department of Agriculture shall be performed under the supervision and direction of the solicitor.

The bill had, in a prior portion of it, appropriated for the solicitor for that year. It had a similar appropriation to this, and later in the appropriation bill Congress used this language:

Hereafter the legal work of the department shall be under the direction and supervision of the solicitor.

I want to call the chairman's attention to the fact that five departments of this Government have solicitors—the State, Treasury, Agriculture, Navy, and Commerce and Labor. And the solicitors of the Treasury Department, State Department, and the Department of Commerce and Labor are appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The positions are established by law, and the solicitors are appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, just as other officers of equal dignity are. But the solicitors for these other departments have grown up in appropriation bills, and it is the practice that they are appointed by the Secretary of the department. That is done without the advice and consent of the Senate, without consulting with anybody, but simply as the personal appointment of the Secretary himself.

Now, it never was the intention of the law—it is not within the letter or the spirit of the law or rule—to permit appointments of this character to be made in this way. The section that the gentleman from South Carolina refers to is simply a general section giving the heads of departments the power to appoint such number of clerks of the different classes, messengers, and people of that kind, as may be necessary in the actual routine of the department's work. It can not be contended, with any sort of reasoning, that the section which the gentleman read was meant to apply to the appointment of a solicitor in the Department of Agriculture or any other department. It says:

The Commissioner of Agriculture shall appoint a chief clerk, * * * and he shall appoint such other employees as Congress may from time to time provide, with salaries corresponding to the salaries of similar officers.

Yes; but the question is, Will we provide the salary? The question is up to us here in this bill. If we do not provide the salary, the Secretary has no authority to appoint, because there is no law authorizing the appointment. And I say, Mr. Chairman—and I say it without fear of successful contradiction by anybody—that the rules and the precedents absolutely settle this question to this effect: First, that an office can not be established in an appropriation bill in this way by simply providing a salary for it; second, that any provision in this bill providing for the salary of an officer whose office is not authorized by previous law is subject to a point of order; and, third, there is no statute establishing it, and these gentlemen can not find any statute or anything that even tends in that direction. With all due respect for these gentlemen, I say that to insist that this provision in the appropriation bill of 1910 provides for the appointment of this officer is, in my judgment, absolutely absurd.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to prolong this discussion at all, but I would like to read, for the information of the Chair, this entire section to which I have referred and to which the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] has referred. I read:

SEC. 523. The Commissioner of Agriculture shall appoint a chief clerk, * * * and he shall appoint such other employees as Congress may from time to time provide, with salaries corresponding to the salaries of similar officers in other departments of the Government; and he shall, as Congress may from time to time provide, employ other persons, for such time as their services may be needed, including chemists, botanists, entomologists, and other persons skilled in the natural sciences pertaining to agriculture.

It is held, Mr. Chairman, by the Attorney General of the United States in his decision as to the legality of the Remsen Board, about which we have heard so much to-day, that the Secretary of Agriculture had the authority under this section to appoint such a board, and he justified his position under the language, "the Secretary of Agriculture shall have the power to employ such other persons," and so forth.

In addition to that, section 161 of the statute reads:

The head of each department is authorized to prescribe regulations, not inconsistent with law, for the government of his department, the conduct of its officers and clerks, the distribution and performance of its business, and the custody, use, and preservation of the records, papers, and property appertaining to it.

Now, of course, the Chair will understand that necessarily the Department of Agriculture has a great deal of legal work to do, and that the Secretary of Agriculture, under this section, has the right to distribute this work; and, having that right, it seems to me that we have provided all the authority necessary to justify the continuance of this appropriation for the chief of the legal work of the department. I call the attention of the Chair to the other fact, that even if it were carried in an appropriation bill, Congress has said specifically how in the future the legal work of the Department of Agriculture shall be conducted, by providing that hereafter the legal work of the Department of Agriculture shall be under the control and direction of the solicitor. It seems to me we have all the authority we want, and if the gentleman from Florida—

The CHAIRMAN. In what bill was that provided?

Mr. LEVER. It was provided in the appropriation bill of 1910; and if the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] desires to get rid of the solicitor, the more direct way for him is to move to strike out the appropriation. I commend that to him as the proper course, to let the House say whether or not the Department of Agriculture shall have its legal business conducted by an officer appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. MANN and Mr. CULLOP rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP].

Mr. MANN. I was going to suggest, Mr. Chairman, that it is pretty late.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair assumed that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] was going to discuss this point of order on the entire paragraph.

Mr. MANN. I was going to suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. LAMB. Before the gentleman suggests that, I will move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. MURRAY. I ask the gentleman to withhold his motion for a moment.

Mr. LAMB. I will withhold the motion.

Mr. MURRAY. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, for the purpose of inserting in the RECORD a speech made by the Hon. OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD, of Alabama, in New York City on December 19, 1911, relative to the initiative and referendum.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman from New York [Mr. AKIN] present?

Mr. AKIN of New York. I am.

Mr. MANN. I carefully looked around to see. I did not know whether he was going to object to Democrats extending remarks.

Mr. AKIN of New York. The gentleman need not be alarmed; I can take care of myself all right.

Mr. MANN. Inasmuch as the request comes from that side of the House, I suppose the gentleman from New York does not object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MURRAY] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD for the purpose stated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The address of Mr. UNDERWOOD is as follows:

INITIATIVE AND REFERENDUM.

[Speech made by Hon. OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD, of Alabama, before the Catholic Club of New York on Dec. 19, 1911.]

The main purpose of government is the protection of life, liberty, and property. The safeguarding of property rights is essential to the advancement of our civilization.

Men do not always awake to the realization that the just enforcement of the law is more essential to good government than the enactment of new statutes.

Less than a century and a half ago the Federal Constitution was written; it became the pattern in its fundamental features for our State constitution. The world had experimented with almost every conceivable method of government for thousands of years before the birth of our Republic. The statesmen who created the form of the new government were essentially students of the theories of government and lovers of the liberties of the people. Most of them had offered their lives and their fortunes in the struggle for their country's independence. No man can justly charge them with either lack of information regarding the essential principles of government or want of honesty of purpose to create a government that would secure to themselves and their children "a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to themselves and their posterity."

WORLD'S FIRST WRITTEN CONSTITUTION.

They proclaimed to the world its first written Constitution, created a government of law in absolute contradistinction to a government of men. The framers of the Federal Constitution were familiar with the repeated failures of governments based on the principle of a direct democracy, where the people were the direct lawmaking power and in some instances the ultimate judicial power of the country.

DANGERS OF A DIRECT DEMOCRACY.

They knew from the history of the past that those governments had failed in their purpose; that the liberties of the people had been destroyed by the extremes and excesses which marked the administration of a government where the laws were made in the forum by the assembled multitude and were not the mature product of selected men especially trained for the work in hand.

They knew that the failure of every direct democracy was due not to the lack of honesty of purpose on the part of the aggregate citizenship assembled in the forum, but to the fact that they were often swayed by their desires, passions, and prejudices, and lacked intimate knowledge of the resultant effect of their actions.

No honest man in his individual entity will controvert the Golden Rule that all men should do unto others as they would be done by, but it is rarely the case that the assembled populace can divorce itself from its selfish desires and deal out abstract justice to those who may be temporarily in the minority.

Realizing the danger and excesses of a direct democracy, the framers of our Constitution endeavored to establish a government that would protect the rights and liberties of the individual and at the same time reflect ultimately the will of the majority in the enactment of the law of the land.

OURS A REPRESENTATIVE FORM OF GOVERNMENT.

To accomplish this end they established a representative form of government, designed to create a lawmaking power responsive to the will of the people and at the same time they wrote in the Constitution certain checks and balances intended to prevent the more brutal force of a majority from destroying the liberty and property rights of the individual.

It must always be borne in mind that the framers of our Constitution were not attempting to establish freedom of government, for they created a government with only certain delegated powers expressly given to the Nation by the States, reserving to the States the right to make most of the laws that affected the liberties of the citizen. The underlying principle of the Constitution was to guarantee the liberty of the citizen and the protection of his property rights against the power of the Government itself.

INDEPENDENT JUDICIARY ESTABLISHED.

To guard and protect these rights, an independent judiciary was established to see that neither the executive nor the legislative branches of the Government encroached upon the guaranteed rights of the individual.

It is evident that the framers of the Constitution were unwilling to trust a selected legislative body, held in check by the veto power of the Executive; fearing even then an unbridled abuse of the power, they established constitutional guaranties of liberty that a majority of the people could not trample upon or the Government itself destroy.

Some may say that a majority of the people will not endanger the liberties and rights of the individual. I wish that this were true, but the history of every government has shown that at times the people, when unchecked by constitutional guaranties, have destroyed individual rights and individual liberty.

UNWISE CHANGES NOW PROPOSED.

It is now proposed by some that we shall, in part, abandon the representative government enacted by our Revolutionary fathers and adopt a system that in the end would establish a direct democracy, when the ultimate power to make laws would be placed directly in the hands of all the people and the independent judiciary, intended to protect the constitutional guaranties of individual liberty, would become subservient to the will of the majority through political compulsion.

We may forget that Madison and Hamilton, soldiers in the War for American Independence, brought their great minds and mature judgments to the framing of the Constitution of the United States, but there is one whose sincere judgment will not be doubted as to the value of a representative government as compared with a direct one, even by those who doubt the sincerity of purpose and the honesty of opinion of other men.

JEFFERSON'S WISE VIEW.

In speaking of "the equal rights of man," Thomas Jefferson declared:

Modern times have the signal advantage, too, of having discovered the only device by which these rights can be secured, to wit, government by the people, acting not in person but by representatives chosen by themselves.

The author of the Declaration of Independence, knowing that all popular government before his time resting on the direct decisions of the people had failed and ultimately had reverted into uncontrolled despotism, rejoiced that the hour had come when a representative government could express the will of a free people.

It is now proposed to abandon the representative principles of government established by our fathers and revert to the direct action of the people, to the principles of an Athenian democracy adapted to modern conditions.

REPRESENTATIVE GOVERNMENT ONLY CHECK ON EXCESSES AND PASSION.

Our representative Government was established to guard against the excesses which had brought the ancient direct popular government to destruction, and because our Government does not at all times immediately respond to public sentiment there are some who insist that the principle of government is at fault and must be changed. They do not reflect that at times they may misjudge real public sentiment, that at other times the instrument of the Government (the representative whom the people can change at recurring periods) is at fault and not the basic principle of the government itself.

My experience as a legislator leads me to believe that the Congress of the United States will always ultimately respond to the enlightened and matured sentiment of the people.

With the changing tides of public sentiment we have repeatedly experienced changes in the exercise of the taxing powers.

We have seen the legislative branch of the Government in direct response to public sentiment in recent years enact railroad rate legislation, pure-food laws, provide for the publicity of campaign funds, national quarantine, irrigate the arid West, and build the Isthmian Canal. Can it be truthfully said that the Congress has failed ultimately to place on the statute books the laws that a majority of the American people were in favor of as a result of their permanent and deliberate judgment?

The response may not be as rapid, but it is probably more permanent, and there is certainly not as much danger of enacting hasty, ill-considered, or bad legislation.

Can not a committee of the Congress, composed of representative men, initiate legislation, within the limitations of the Constitution, guard against excesses and abuses, protect the rights of the minority, voice the wishes of the majority, as well or better than the partisan friends of a measure who, in order that they may accomplish one result, are tempted to reach so far that they leave a wake of destruction as to collateral matters the measure touches?

UNTRUSTWORTHINESS OF PETITIONS.

It is true that under the system proposed a petition by a percentage of voters would first have to be obtained. But let every man ask himself how often he has signed petitions to please or get rid of the person who presented the paper to determine what thought and deliberation will be exercised by the average man who signs a petition.

PEOPLE SUFFER MORE FROM FAILURE OF LAW ENFORCEMENT THAN FROM LACK OF PROPER LEGISLATION.

Should I stop to criticize our Government I would say that the people suffer far more from the failure to enforce the laws on the statute books than they do from the lack of proper legislation. How many remedial laws are to be found on the statute books that, if fairly enforced, would remedy the evils we complain against? But it is so much easier to cry out for new legislation than to insist that our neighbor shall go to jail for violating the law we already have.

If there are evils in our Government as it exists to-day it is not in its organic form. It is due to the failure of those in office to honestly, fairly, and justly perform the duties imposed upon them. The remedy is plain and the way is clear. The people should drive from the places of power and responsibility the unfaithful servant and elect those who will be faithful and true to the trust imposed upon them.

THE PEOPLE AND THE REPRESENTATIVES.

You tell me that the people can not elect honest and faithful servants. I tell you that the masses of the people are far better judges of men than they are of measures, and are far more likely to select an honest man than an honest measure.

When you say that the voter can not select a public official who will reflect the will of the people in his office and be faithful to the Constitution of his country, I say you reflect on the very first principle of free government and misjudge the honesty and the intelligence of the American people.

Our Constitution was born in the hour when the love of liberty and freedom was ripe in the hearts of men. For a century it has withstood the storms of war, greed, and intolerance; through the tempests of discontent, danger, and disaster it has protected the lives, liberty, and property of our people.

Let us elect honest men to public office, men who have the courage to stand for the true interest of the Constitution they represent regardless of what effect it may have on their personal fortunes. There then will be no demand for a change of the fundamental principles of our Government.

Mr. LAMB. I renew my motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia moves that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BORLAND, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 18960) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and had come to no resolution thereon.

INSTRUCTOR IN THE ARMY OF CHILE (S. DOC. NO. 352).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying document, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a letter from the Secretary of War having relation to the request of the Republic of Chile that an officer of the Coast Artillery Corps, United States Army, be permitted to serve as an instructor in the army of that Republic.

I believe that should Congress grant authority for the detail of the officer named by the Secretary of War it would inure greatly to the benefit of the relations existing between Chile and the United States, and I respectfully and strongly urge that Congress take favorable action in the case under the precedents which have been established and which are cited in the letter of the Secretary.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 29, 1912.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES]—

Mr. AKIN of New York. I object.

The SPEAKER. Wait until the Chair states the request. The gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. AKIN of New York. I object.

REPUBLIC OF CHINA.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Foreign Affairs I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read. This is a matter of some moment, and I hope there will be no objection to it. It is reported unanimously from the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 254, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read House joint resolution 254, congratulating the people of China on their assumption of the powers, duties, and responsibilities of self-government, as follows:

Whereas the Chinese nation has successfully asserted the fact that sovereignty is vested in the people, and has recognized the principle that government derives its authority from the consent of the governed, thereby terminating a condition of internal strife; and Whereas the American people are inherently and by tradition sympathetic with all efforts to adopt the ideals and institutions of representative government: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the United States of America congratulates the people of China on their assumption of the powers, duties, and responsibilities of self-government, and expresses the confident hope that in the adoption and maintenance of a republican form of government the rights, liberties, and happiness of the Chinese people will be secure and the progress of the country insured.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, the joint resolution just read by the Clerk congratulating the people of China on assuming the duties and the responsibilities of self-government speaks for itself and needs no apology and no explanation from any patriotic American. It should pass the Congress of the United States without a dissenting vote.

It is fitting and proper that the people of the United States of America should congratulate the people of China on their assumption of the powers, duties, and responsibilities of self-government, and to express the confident hope that in the adoption and maintenance of a republican form of government the rights, liberties, and happiness of the Chinese people will be secure and the progress of the country insured.

The resolution is in diplomatic form, according to custom, and in no way contravenes the status quo in the Orient or interferes with the protocol existing between the allied powers. Its adoption by Congress will be in line with our time-honored precedents.

The establishment of a republic in China is a great world event—momentous in the annals of human history. Its accomplishment speaks volumes for the moderation and the patriotism of the Chinese people, challenges the admiration of civilization, and gives renewed evidence of the growth and the progress of the cause of representative government.

I believe the people of China are capable of self-government. I reassert that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. I feel confident that the adoption of this resolution will meet with the approval of the liberty-loving people of our country. I indulge the hope that it will be followed ere long by Executive action officially recognizing the Republic of China. Long live the Republic of China!

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, we would like to hear over here what is going on with reference to China.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from California that it is unnecessary for me to dwell at length on the urgent reasons why this resolution should pass immediately.

Mr. RAKER. If there are any urgent reasons I think the House ought to know them.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, has the gentleman from California any objection to congratulating the people of China on establishing a republic? This resolution simply congratulates the people of China on assuming the rights and duties of self-government.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I would congratulate any people who are in favor of a republican form of government.

Mr. SULZER. Good. That is all this resolution does.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SULZER, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH COLOMBIA.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the following resolution, coming over from a former day, which will be read.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 237, submitted by Mr. HITCHCOCK February 28, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to transmit to the Senate copies of all correspondence and communications between this Government and the Government of Colombia since the last presentation to the Senate of such correspondence and communications to this date.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, my pending resolution is a very much simpler resolution than the one which I at first introduced. The other one was objected to for the reason that it seemed to threaten, as certain Senators thought, the reopening of the old Panama controversy and scandal. My present resolution merely calls for information as to diplomatic correspondence, to which the Senate is entitled. It proposes to bring down to date the correspondence between the United States and Colombia which has not been submitted to the Senate by the President since the year 1904. In that respect, it seems to me that the resolution is without any objection whatever and can be opposed for no legitimate reason.

I am frank to say, however, Mr. President, that the reopening of the old Panama controversy and scandal sooner or later is inevitable, and I am frank to say now that at the proper time I believe there will be a widespread demand and an intelligent effort to have the ban of secrecy removed from those documents which have been kept under secrecy so long in our official archives.

Mr. President, I do not believe that when the American people know the real facts of the case they will be content to have this great Republic continue in her indecent attitude toward Colombia by refusing absolutely and without qualification to submit to arbitration the claims of Colombia for indemnity, at the same time that this Nation is assuming toward all other nations of the world a position, or at least a pretense, of being willing to arbitrate every question proper to submit to arbitration.

Mr. President, it is too late to restore the Province of Panama to Colombia, and it is only a hollow pretense when gentlemen claim that they object to arbitration for the alleged reason that arbitration would open up the question of our title to the Panama Canal and the existence of the Panama Republic. The Panama Republic has been recognized, not only by the United States, but it has been recognized by every civilized nation of the world, and we are under a contract to maintain the independence of the Republic of Panama, and all other nations are under a pledge to recognize Panama as an independent Government. So, I say that it is folly for those who oppose arbitration to do so under the claim or the pretense that they do it because it will reopen all the questions relating to the title to the Panama strip or to the existence of the Republic of Panama.

But, Mr. President, it is not too late to do justice. If we wronged our sister Republic of Colombia, and if that wrong has become a permanent fact in history, it is nevertheless not too late for us to respond in legitimate damages for our act in that matter. I want to call the attention of the American people to the inconsistency and hypocrisy of gentlemen who prate so loudly of their desire to secure sweeping and complicated arbitration treaties with certain favored and powerful nations; they who put themselves on a lofty moral pedestal as the advocates of arbitration treaties and yet complacently and contemptuously unite to ignore the just demands for arbitration made by this poor little helpless Republic of Colombia. I believe it will only be necessary to submit the facts in the case to the American people to force by public opinion the arbitration of the claims which Colombia presents to us. Those claims are for damages which we inflicted on Colombia by hatching, harboring, and aiding a revolutionary conspiracy, which we sent our naval vessels to defend while it despoiled Colombia of her most valuable Province.

That was not done in order that we might have a canal, for we could have had a canal without that scandal. We could have had a canal there on the Isthmus of Panama under a treaty with Colombia by a little more patience and concession. Or if that was found impracticable, we could have built the canal across Nicaragua. Under the Spooner Act Congress had directed the President to build the canal across Nicaragua if he could not agree upon terms with Colombia. That should have been done and would have been done if the Panama Canal proprietors had not been determined to get their $40,000,000 out of Uncle Sam and possessed enough influence to control the action of our Government.

Let me trace briefly the history of the Panama Canal so as to refresh our memories.

If it had not been for the desire of those who owned the old Panama Canal Co., there would to-day be no Republic of Panama. The franchise of that old company was to expire by limitation in October, 1904. The company claimed that it had an extension until 1910 issued by the secretary of finance for the Republic of Colombia, for which the company had paid a million dollars. There was, however, some cloud on this claim; it was disputed by the Colombian authorities and discussed before the Colombian Congress; but even if the company had a franchise to build the canal, which still was to continue until 1910, work had ceased, the company was practically dead, and it was in any event utterly out of the question to finish the canal within that time.

In December, 1901, the Nicaragua Canal bill had been favorably reported in the House of Representatives and passed after a comparatively short debate. In that same month, in December, 1901, a convention was agreed to between the Nicaraguan Government and the United States for the construction of the canal across the Isthmus at Nicaragua. In December of the same year, 1901, the Panama Canal Co., realizing that the American people were making up their minds to build the Nicaraguan Canal, abandoned previous exorbitant claims and offered to sell their canal to us for $40,000,000.

The House rejected even this Panama proposition and passed the Nicaragua bill, as recommended by the Canal Commission. Within a few days afterwards President Roosevelt called the Isthmian Canal Commission together and insisted, and succeeded by his insistence, in inducing the commission to reverse its former decision and to make a new report in favor of the Panama Canal under the new offer from the Panama Canal Co. A month afterwards, in February, the Colombian Government notified the Panama Canal Co. in Paris that Colombia would stand on its rights and not permit a transfer of the canal without the consent of the Republic of Colombia. In doing so the Republic of Colombia was strictly within its rights. The franchise it had granted provided that the canal could not be transferred to another country without the consent of the Republic of Colombia. This right of Colombia was recognized—recognized by the canal company, recognized by the United States, recognized by France. It was undisputed.

On March 10, after a long struggle, the Senate Committee on Inter-oceanic Canals reported in favor of the Nicaragua bill as passed by the other House, and the bill came before the Senate for consideration. After some weeks of labor Mr. William Nelson Cromwell induced the minority members of that committee to make a minority report in favor of the Panama route, and that report, as has lately been developed, is largely in his own words. In June, 1902, the Senate, by a vote of 42 to 34, disagreed with the House and decided in favor of the Panama proposition. The bill went into conference. Finally, the other House receded and accepted the Senate bill, and on the 25th of June, 1902, President Roosevelt signed that measure. That act, however, provided that the United States should take the Panama route only upon several definite conditions. One was that there should be a good title. The title was examined and ultimately found to be good, except that Colombia had an interest in it and an absolute right to veto a transfer. The other condition was that the canal should not be built across Panama unless a treaty should be agreed to between the United States and the Republic of Colombia. That treaty, after a protracted period of negotiation, in which, first, Dr. Concha and later Dr. Herran represented the Colombian Government, was finally agreed to between the representatives of the two Governments. It provided for the payment of $10,000,000 to Colombia and for payment of $250,000 a year rental or royalty thereafter.

Dr. Herran did not sign that treaty on behalf of Colombia willingly nor until he received an ultimatum from the Government of the United States, under the orders of President Roosevelt, that the time had come to close the negotiations, and that the only terms the Government would offer were $10,000,000 cash and $250,000 a year. The record shows that the ultimatum was submitted to him; that he advised his Government that it was an ultimatum, the last words that would be spoken, and he finally signed the treaty.

The ultimatum by our Government was as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 22, 1903.

DEAR MR. HERRAN: I am commanded by the President to say to you that the reasonable time that the statute accords for the conclusion of negotiations with Colombia for the excavation of a canal on the Isthmus has expired, and he has authorized me to sign with you the treaty of which I had the honor to give you a draft, with the modification that the sum of $100,000, fixed therein as the annual payment, be increased $250,000. I am not authorized to consider or discuss any other change.

With sentiments of high consideration, etc., JOHN HAY.

I should say by way of explanation that there was no dispute over the cash payment, but that Colombia claimed a larger rental. That Dr. Herran regarded the above as an ultimatum is shown by his cablegram to his country, as follows:

WASHINGTON, January 22, 1903.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS, Bogota:

Treaty signed to-day accepting ultimatum $10,000,000 and $250,000 annuity.

HERRAN.

The treaty itself provided that it should be submitted to the Senate of the United States for ratification by the United States and to the Senate of Colombia for ratification by Colombia. It was submitted to the Senate of the United States, and the Senate of the United States ratified it. It was submitted to the Senate of Colombia, underwent a long, vigorous, and intelligent discussion by that body, and finally, on the 23d day of August, 1903, the Senate of Colombia unanimously rejected the treaty, not on the ground that the amount of money was inadequate, but on the constitutional ground that the Senate of the Republic of Colombia as it then existed had no constitutional power to surrender sovereignty over a part of the Republic of Colombia.

Mr. President, I think I have quoted the history of this case correctly up to this time. I believe that the Senate of the Republic of Colombia acted entirely within its constitutional powers; and when it had so acted it was the duty of the President of the United States to follow the instructions in the law and take up the Nicaragua Canal route. He had been authorized and directed to do so; he had signed the bill which had provided that such should be the ultimate course of the United States in this contingency. Instead of taking that course there at once began a conspiracy to disrupt Colombia and despoil her of her most valuable province; to create on the Isthmus of Panama a new Republic through a comic-opera revolution under the protection of the naval vessels of the United States.

What were the facts at this time, Mr. President? The United States was not simply in position of a friendly nation, not simply a sister republic of Colombia, but she was under a solemn pledge by reason of the treaty of 1846 to maintain and protect the sovereignty of the Republic of Colombia in the Isthmian strip, in return for which she had received and enjoyed valuable concessions. That protection was our bounden duty under the treaty made in 1846 and then in force; and yet, in spite of that treaty and in defiance of the law of Congress providing that the Nicaraguan Canal should be built if Colombia did not agree to the transfer of the Panama Canal to us, the Panama strip was seized by force while we held Colombia's hands. In spite of the fact that we were under every solemn pledge of the treaty of 1846 to protect Colombia in possession of her ancient and most valuable province, powerful officers of the United States Government, headed by President Roosevelt himself, became parties to a conspiracy hatched in the United States, nourished in the United States, and financed by the Panama Canal Co. and William Nelson Cromwell in New York City. Testimony in the New York World case shows that the Panama Canal Co., of Paris, sent by cable $100,000 to Heidelberg, Ickelheimer & Co., the New York bankers, for the credit of Bunau-Varilla, Mr. Cromwell's co-conspirator, and that Mr. Cromwell raised another $100,000 by borrowing it from the Bowling Green Trust Co., of New York City, on Panama stock. Both Cromwell and Bunau-Varilla at that time exercised great influence in administration circles in Washington.

Those are the facts which are being written and which will come out more plainly before the American people as time goes on; facts which have been developed in sworn testimony in the case of the United States against the New York World, an action which did not come to trial because it had no legal standing, but which the New York World was ready to meet with sworn testimony and complete proofs. It was prepared to prove that the President of the United States was cognizant of this conspiracy, that he was having interviews with the conspirators, that the so-called declaration of independence for the new Republic of Panama was written in the United States, that the flag of Panama was made in New York City, and that when the time came the conspirators by cablegram to America ordered the vessels of the United States Navy to go to Panama and to Colon, very much as you would order by telephone a taxicab to come to do your bidding in these days.

Mr. President, we are laboring under a great many disadvantages in examining this case, because part of the correspondence is under a pledge of secrecy, and I am only touching upon those facts which have been brought out in a public way here and there and are not under that pledge.

I shall not tire the Senate by reading much, but I shall take the liberty to read at this time a letter—a very significant letter—written on the 18th day of October, 1903. Remember that Colombia rejected the treaty in August, 1903, and almost immediately thereafter the hatching of the conspiracy for the creation of this fake revolution was commenced. The conspirators had proceeded so far that upon the 18th day of October, 1903, in the city of New York, Dr. Amador, soon to become the first President of the new Republic, wrote the following letter to his son:

Dear little son:—

As a matter of fact, the little son was a mature man, but that was a term of affection, no doubt—

I received your telegram that you are not coming, as they have refused you permission; also received your letter of the 17th. If the wreath does not come, they will send it from the Endicott by the next steamer. The reason for your coming was for you to meet Bunau-Varilla—

I pause here to say that Bunau-Varilla, who, with William Nelson Cromwell, became one of the conspirators in the establishment of this Republic, who at that time had great influence with the administration and was able practically to dictate the dispatch of American naval vessels, had been, as I recall it, involved in frauds in connection with the Panama Canal, and by the French courts before he came to the United States had been found to be guilty of fraudulent transactions. But to resume—to whom I have spoken of you. He says that if all turns out well you shall have a good place on the medical commission, which is the first that will begin work; that my name is in Hay's office—

I presume that was the Secretary of State—and that certainly nothing will be refused you.

Now, mark these words:

The plan seems to me good. A portion of the Isthmus declares itself independent.

This was written two weeks before a single man had declared himself independent.

The plan seems to me good. A portion of the Isthmus declares itself independent, and that portion the United States will not allow any Colombian forces to attack.

The United States, which had guaranteed the sovereignty of the Isthmus to the Colombian Government in return for valuable concessions, was not to permit Colombia to suppress disorder or rebellion.

An assembly is called, and this gives authority to a minister to be appointed by the new Government in order to make a treaty without need of ratification by that assembly. The treaty being approved by both parties, the new Republic remains under the protection of the United States, and to it are added the other districts of the Isthmus which do not already form part of the new Republic, and these also remain under the protection of the United States.

Prophetic words—before anyone in the United States, save only a few conspirators and a few officials of great power here in Washington, knew that there was to be a new republic.

Mr. President, I shall not read the rest of the letter, but ask to incorporate it in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted:

The remainder of the letter is as follows:

The movement will be delayed a few days; we want to have here the minister who is going to be named, so that once the movement is made he can be appointed by cable and take up the treaty. In 30 days everything will be concluded.

We have some resources on the movement being made, and already this has been arranged with a bank.

As soon as everything is arranged, I will tell B.-V. to look out for you. He says if you do not wish to go he will look out for a position for you in New York. He is a man of great influence.

A thousand embraces to Pepe, and my remembrances to Jennie and Mr. Smith.

Your affectionate father,

AMADOR.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Immediately upon writing that letter Dr. Amador left for Colon, and on the 27th of the same month—the 27th of October—held at night the first meeting with the conspirators there on the Isthmus; six or seven of them, I think, together. He found to his surprise, as the testimony before the committee of the House of Representative shows, that his conspirators were disappointed that he had not brought a written assurance from the President of the United States that the conspirators would receive United States protection, and in order to give them something upon which they could lean and in order to guarantee that this protection should be vouchsafed, he sent a cablegram a day later addressed to the agent of the conspirators in New York. The cablegram referred to is as follows:

From Amador, Panama, to Lindo, New York:

This cable is for Bunau-Varilla. We have news of the arrival of the Colombian forces on the Atlantic side within five days. They are more than 200 strong. Urge warships Colon.

He told them that the Republic of Colombia had dispatched a vessel with some 200 soldiers to the Isthmus of Panama because of the suspicion that there was to be an uprising, and he concluded his telegram by asking for naval vessels. That was on the 29th of October. On the 30th of October he received a cablegram in reply, stating that within 36 hours war vessels would be at Colon, and within 48 hours they would be at Panama, and they were.

The first result of Amador's appeal to Bunau-Varilla was the issuance of the following order, in Washington, to one of our naval vessels:

OCTOBER 30, 1903.

NASHVILLE, Kingston, Jamaica:

Hold vessel in readiness to return to Guantanamo.

That is in plain English, but the following is in cipher:

Secret and confidential. Proceed at once to Colon. Telegraph in cipher the situation after consulting with the United States consul. Your destination is a secret. Telegraph in cipher your departure from Kingston.

DARLING, Acting.

The record should show, and I ask here the privilege of incorporating in my speech, certain secret telegrams to indicate that the vessels of the United States had previously been placed at a convenient near-by place by order of the President of the United States, held there subject to cablegram orders, and that those cablegram orders were supplied upon the demand of the conspirators and the vessels arrived just as predicted at Colon, on the time, and a little late at Panama.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted to insert the matter referred to.

The matter referred to is as follows:

On the day before Amador, the conspirator, left New York for Panama—that is to say, on October 19—President Roosevelt ordered the Navy Department to hold warships within striking distance of the Isthmus of Panama on both the Atlantic and Pacific sides. Pursuant to this order instructions were issued the same day as follows:

GLASS, Marblehead, San Francisco, Cal.:

Send Boston or other vessel ahead of squadron to Acapulco. [In cipher:] Send the Boston with all possible dispatch to San Juan del Sur, Nicaragua. She must arrive by November 1, with coal sufficient for returning to Acapulco. Secret and confidential. Her ostensible destination Acapulco only.

MOODY.

NAVY YARD, Brooklyn, N. Y.:

Desire Dixie sail for League Island in time embark battalion and be ready for sea 23d.

MOODY.

BARKEE, Kearsarge, Navy Yard, Brooklyn, N. Y.:

Dixie must be ready to sail from League Island with battalion about 23d.

MOODY.

Orders were given to place a contingent of 400 marines on board the Dixie, and the U. S. S. Atlanta was ordered to proceed to Guantanamo.

The following are samples of later instructions to the expectant naval commanders issued two days before the outbreak and just before the Colombian soldiers arrived:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., November 2, 1903.

DIXIE, Kingston, Jamaica:

Secret and confidential. Proceed with all possible dispatch to Colon. Maintain free and uninterrupted transit. If interruption threatened by armed force, occupy the line of railroad. Prevent landing of any armed force with hostile intent, either government or insurgent, either at Colon, Porto Bello, or other port. Send copy of instructions to the senior officer present at Panama upon arrival of Boston. Government force reported approaching the Isthmus in vessels. Prevent their landing if in your judgment this would precipitate a conflict. Acknowledgment is required.

DARLING, Acting.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., November 2, 1903.

NASHVILLE, care American Consul, Colon:

Secret and confidential. Maintain free and interrupted transit. If interruption threatened by armed force with hostile intent, either government or insurgent, either at Colon, Porto Bello, or other point. Send copy of instructions to the senior officer present at Panama upon arrival of Boston. Have sent copy of instructions and have telegraphed Dixie to proceed with all possible dispatch from Kingston to Colon. Government force reported approaching Colon in vessels. Prevent their landing if in your judgment this would precipitate a conflict. Acknowledgment is required.

DARLING, Acting.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, look at the history as events followed then in rapid sequence. On November 2, the Nashville, which was one vessel that had been ordered, arrived at Colon at 5.30 in the afternoon and found everything on the Isthmus quiet; no revolution there; found Colombia in complete possession of her ancient Province.

On November 3 the Colombian gunboat arrived with 500 troops for the Panama garrison, just across the Isthmus, and on that date a naval commander of the United States recorded the fact that "Colombia was in undisputed control of the Province."

Mr. President, the facts show that it had been expected by the conspirators to have the revolution on November 3, for the reason that that was election day in the United States, and revolution news would be lost sight of in the American papers in the midst of the great mass of political news which would appear the day after the election. But when Amador reached the Isthmus and found that the American vessels were not yet there for his protection, and that there was some doubt as to the exact hour when they would arrive, he persuaded the conspirators to delay until November 4, to be sure that Uncle Sam's vessels should be there to support the miserable little crowd of conspirators; and so the actual revolution occurred at 6 o'clock p. m. on November 4, 1903. It was not even known across the Isthmus in Colon that there had been a revolution until the next day, except by three or four conspirators in the town of Colon who controlled the railroad and telegraph lines.

This delay of one day was evidently not understood by our Government at Washington which had arranged for it on the 3d, and the following official cablegram inquiry as to what had become of the revolution, and the reply thereto, are amusing:

WASHINGTON, November 3, 1903.

EHRMAN, Panama:

Uprising on Isthmus reported. Keep department promptly and fully informed.

LOOMIS, Acting.

PANAMA, November 3, 1903.

SECRETARY OF STATE, Washington:

No uprising yet. Reported will be in the night. Situation is critical.

EHRMAN.

The rest of the history is brief, Mr. President. The 500 soldiers which Colombia had sent there to maintain the peace on the Isthmus, to retain the rights and protect the sovereignty of the Republic, were refused in the first place railroad transportation to the town of Panama. Their commanding officer went over to Panama to learn why it was that the cars could not be furnished. As soon as he arrived in Panama, at the very time the revolution was about to be started, he was seized and placed in jail, and the inferior officer he had left at Colon having these 500 men did not learn of his superior's imprisonment for some time because the means of communication were controlled by the company. When he did learn of it he naturally became furious and proposed to take by force the necessary cars to go to Panama. Then the United States marines were landed from the Nashville and other vessels of the United States, and they prevented by show of force the exercise of that sovereignty which Colombia had every right to exercise herself and which she had every treaty right to suppose we would exercise for her.

I have been told that I will probably endanger the passage of my resolution calling for this correspondence by making this speech upon it. Perhaps I will. But I believe the time has come when the American people are entitled to know the secret history of the creation by conspiracy in the United States of the Republic of Panama, and I believe that the Senate, at least, has a right to know what the demands of the Republic of Colombia since that time have been for the arbitration of her claim for damages.

I have been told, and it has been suggested to me, that if arbitrated probably the measure of Colombia's damages would be so great that it would appall the American people; that damages would not be confined simply to the payment of $10,000,000, which we once offered, and the annuity of $250,000 a year in perpetuity, because that provided only for the Panama strip for the canal, whereas, as a matter of fact, our act deprived Colombia not only of the canal strip, but deprived her of all the Province of Panama, her most valuable Province, possibly. Perhaps that is so; possibly the damages would not be limited to $10,000,000 or $15,000,000 or $50,000,000; they might go to $100,000,000 or more; but because the damage is great and because a court of arbitration might award the people of Colombia such enormous damages is no reason for us to shrink from paying the penalty for our act. I do not believe that the American people, who are a highly moral people and a highly just people, would shrink from paying to the last cent that penalty which a court of arbitration might award.

Mr. President, I have said some things here which reflect on the former President, Theodore Roosevelt. I have done so with mixed feelings. I recognize the great service he rendered to the American people in many particulars as President of the United States. I realize fully the value of his administration to the American people in many practical ways, but there are two very black spots on his record, and we must recognize the bad at the same time that we acknowledge the good. The one black spot was when he became a party to the absorption by the Steel Trust of the Tennessee Coal & Iron Co. in violation of the law, a party to a crime against the American people; and the other was when he became a party to the conspiracy hatched in the United States to dismember a sister Republic, which we were under every moral obligation and every legal obligation as well to protect and defend.

I move the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the resolution be again reported.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution. Without objection, the resolution is agreed to.

SENATOR FROM WISCONSIN.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any other morning business? [A pause.] Morning business is closed.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 299, being the report on the Stephenson case.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho calls up a privileged matter.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I desire to make a privileged motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. One privileged matter is now before the Senate. Is it in reference to this matter that the Senator from Washington desires to make a motion?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is not in reference to that, but it is in reference to a privileged motion—to take up a matter which is on the calendar, the morning hour not having expired.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is concluded.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I understand the morning hour for the consideration of business on the calendar expires at 4 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair just announced that morning business was concluded. The Chair asked if there was other morning business, and failing to receive any response, the Chair announced that morning business had been concluded. Morning business having been concluded, the Senator from Idaho called up a privileged matter. As that matter is up, it can be disposed of only by certain motions.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I rise to make a motion in a privileged matter which, I think, takes precedence over the matter presented by the Senator from Idaho during the morning hour—a motion to take up and consider a resolution on the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks it does not take precedence. The Chair thinks the only motions now in order are those enumerated under Rule XXII.

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Chair will permit me, I should like to call attention to the rule to which I refer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will be very glad to have his attention called to the rule.

Mr. REED. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington has the floor.

Mr. REED. I rise to ask the Senator from Washington to speak loud enough so that we can hear him here.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I read from Rule IX:

Immediately after the consideration of cases not objected to upon the calendar is completed, and not later than 2 o'clock, if there shall be no special orders for that time, the Calendar of General Orders shall be taken up and proceeded with in its order, beginning with the first subject on the calendar next after the last subject disposed of in proceeding with the calendar; and in such case the following motions shall be in order at any time as privileged motions, save as against a motion to adjourn, or to proceed to the consideration of executive business, or questions of privilege, to wit:

First. A motion to proceed to the consideration of an appropriation or revenue bill.

Second. A motion to proceed to the consideration of any other bill on the calendar, which motion shall not be open to amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate is now considering a question of privilege.

Mr. HEYBURN. Of the highest privilege.

Mr. POINDEXTER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington will state it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Do I understand that the disposition of business upon the calendar and a motion to consider matters upon the calendar can be interrupted at any time by the suggestion of a contested-election case?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That question is not now before the Senate. The Senator from Idaho did call up a privileged question, and when he called it up that question was before the Senate. That can be disposed of now only by one of the motions provided for in Rule XXII.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, it has been, I think, the universal custom of the Senate, when the calendar is reached under Rule VIII, that a motion may be made to proceed to the consideration of any other business, superseding the consideration of the calendar, if it is agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Oh, certainly.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Under Rule XXII, I move that the resolution which the Senator from Idaho has suggested, the Stephenson case—I do not remember the number—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I move that the consideration of it be postponed until the hour of 4 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington moves to postpone the consideration of the pending matter until 4 o'clock.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not think such a motion is in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] gave notice yesterday that immediately after the conclusion of the routine morning business to-day he would address the Senate on the Stephenson case. Since I have been in the Senate it has been the universal practice, as a matter of courtesy, to recognize a notice of that kind and permit the Senator to proceed. It seems to me that the attention of the Senator from Washington being called to that he will not insist upon his motion.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will not insist on it if the Senator from Kansas would object to a postponement of the matter until the hour of 4 o'clock. I should like to state, however, that the matter which I am seeking to have an opportunity to present ought to be disposed of in a very few moments. It has already been debated a number of times. It is resolution No. 231, directing the Commissioner of the Bureau of Labor to make an investigation in regard to the strike at Lawrence, and if it can not be considered by the Senate until some indefinite time in the future, if it has to give way every day to the Stephenson case, the uses and purposes for which the resolution was introduced will have disappeared. Consequently it is important, if the resolution is to be considered at all, that it be considered now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator from Washington is to postpone until 4 o'clock the consideration of the pending question. [Putting the question.] The yeas appear to have it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask for a division.

There were, on a division—yeas 15, noes 19.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas have it, and the motion is lost.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW].

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, on August 15, 1911, the Senate directed the Committee on Privileges and Elections to ascertain whether there were "used or employed corrupt methods or practices" in the election of Mr. ISAAC STEPHENSON, a Senator from Wisconsin. The committee has made its report, and the question for the Senate to determine is whether the evidence submitted by the committee shows that "corrupt methods or practices" were used in procuring Mr. STEPHENSON'S election.

I believe the evidence shows that corrupt methods and practices were used—that Mr. STEPHENSON and his managers not only corruptly used money to secure his election, but also flagrantly violated the laws of the State of Wisconsin against corrupt practices in elections, and that by mere technicalities they seek to avoid the responsibility for their conduct. Any man who will openly violate the statutes of his State that have been passed to protect the honesty of its elections is not worthy a seat in this body, yet the primary question for the Senate to decide is not, were the statutes of Wisconsin violated, but, did corruption in the election of Mr. STEPHENSON actually occur?

The chairman of the subcommittee, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], in his opinion in the report, takes the amazing position that corruption in the primary election, which resulted in Mr. STEPHENSON securing the Republican nomination, can not be considered as having any bearing on the legislative election; that the primary practically has no more connection with the action of the legislature than a "straw vote" would have. Such a position, in my opinion, would wrongfully absolve Mr. STEPHENSON and his managers from the gross and indefensible corruption committed by them in the primary election, and would permit them to escape its penalties. The methods and practices which they used in the primary Mr. HEYBURN himself condemned in the following language:

The amount of money expended by Mr. STEPHENSON, Mr. Cook, Mr. Hatten, and Mr. McGovern in the primary campaign was so extravagant, and the expenditures made by and on behalf of these gentlemen were made with such reckless disregard of the propriety, as to justify the sharpest criticism. Such expenditures were in violation of the fundamental principles underlying our system of government, which contemplated the selection of candidates by the electors and not the selection of the electors by the candidate. * * * Were a candidate for a State office in Wisconsin to conduct a campaign in the manner in which the campaign of Mr. STEPHENSON and of other men who sought election to the United States Senate were conducted, it would be very difficult to justify such conduct under the laws of the State.

Yet by an ingenious argument the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] attempts to exempt Mr. STEPHENSON from the results of these corrupt practices in the primary, which he condemns and which are shocking to the patriotic sense of every honest American citizen. I hold that an act of corruption that contributed to Mr. STEPHENSON's nomination in the primary is just as culpable as if it had occurred in the election by the legislature.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will ask the Senator from Kansas if he objects to being interrupted?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do not.

Mr. HEYBURN. If he does, I will not interrupt him.

Mr. BRISTOW. I do not object.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will then suggest that I at no time admitted that there was any corruption shown in the primaries. In fact, I stated emphatically that in the judgment of the subcommittee no such corruption was shown to have existed.

Mr. BRISTOW. The inference I drew from the Senator's language in his report was that the expenditure was in violation of the fundamental principle underlying our system of government, and that were a candidate for a State office in Wisconsin to conduct his campaign in the manner in which the campaign of Mr. STEPHENSON and other men who sought elections to the Senate was conducted, it would be very difficult to justify such conduct under the laws of the State.

Mr. HEYBURN. Those are separate propositions. The first proposition was directed at the morals of the primary system, which I think are bad, and I hope I made it plain that I was of that opinion. The second referred to the relation between a candidate under the statutes of a State as to the effect of the State statutes upon his candidacy, which has nothing to do with this case.

Mr. BRISTOW. I will proceed. I will not, of course, undertake to determine for the Senator what is corruption and what is not, but I will submit to the Senate the facts gleaned from these volumes and let Senators determine whether or not they think the acts of the parties who conducted this primary election were corrupt.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is a proper line of argument.

Mr. BRISTOW. If Mr. STEPHENSON had not received the nomination in the primary, he would not have been elected by the legislature. His name doubtless would never have been presented to that body for its consideration. A large number of the candidates for the legislature publicly declared that they would vote in the legislature for the man for United States Senator who secured the party nomination in the primary; so that it was necessary for Mr. STEPHENSON to have that nomination in order to secure the election, and the corrupt or unlawful expenditure of money in securing votes in the primary was just as reprehensible as would have been its expenditure to get votes in the legislative election.

In the consideration of the case I shall quote largely from the testimony of Mr. STEPHENSON's friends and supporters. His campaign is an interesting sidelight on the methods of a "business man in politics." In Mr. STEPHENSON's testimony, on page 23 of the first volume of the hearings, the following interrogatory appears:

The CHAIRMAN. Did you expend any money in connection with your nomination or election as a Senator—during the primary—between the time that you announced your candidacy and the date when the primary was held?

Senator STEPHENSON. Yes; I spent a hundred and seven thousand seven hundred and something.

The CHAIRMAN. Tell the subcommittee how you spent the amount that you have named.

Senator STEPHENSON. I appointed Mr. E. A. Edmonds an agent to spend the money.

The CHAIRMAN. How did you proceed to place money in Mr. Edmonds's hands? How did you do it—hand it to him yourself?

Senator STEPHENSON. I appointed Mr. J. H. Puelicher, cashier of the Marshall & Ilsley Bank, and Mr. J. A. Van Cleve as treasurers, and they were to pay Mr. Edmonds the money when he called for it.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you place a limit upon the amount of money which they were to furnish Mr. Edmonds?

Senator STEPHENSON. No. No; it came along from time to time, exceeding far beyond what I expected that it would.

Senator STEPHENSON then presented a detailed statement of the amount of money that he had deposited in banks to be paid out by his treasurers upon orders by Mr. Edmonds, aggregating, in all, $111,385.49, of which amount $107,793.05 was expended.

Five thousand dollars of this amount was placed in Mr. Edmonds's hands direct, which he was authorized to pay out himself. As I understand the testimony, the remainder was paid out upon Mr. Edmonds's authorization by the treasurers. A Mr. Rodney Sacket, a clerk in the office of the secretary of the senate, seemed to be a confidential agent of Senator STEPHENSON, who was an advisory or assistant manager, and who kept the accounts. Senator STEPHENSON seemed to pay little attention to the canvass and to have no great knowledge of the details for which the larger part of this enormous sum of money was expended. That is clearly shown by the testimony. On page 27 of the first volume the following appears.

I will state that I am going to read quite a good deal from the testimony, using the language of the witnesses themselves, because I think that it presents to the Senate a picture of what happened more accurately than for anyone to undertake to tell what happened:

The CHAIRMAN. Senator, what was the sum of $2,000 expended for which you paid to J. A. Van Cleve on June 28 by a check on the Stephenson National Bank?

Senator STEPHENSON. He and Mr. Puelicher were my treasurers. I appointed them, and they wished to give to Mr. Edmonds, the manager, such sums as he required.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know what that was expended for?

Senator STEPHENSON. No; I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know what the item of $10,000 was expended for which you paid by check on July 6 to J. A. Van Cleve?

Senator STEPHENSON. No; I do not know about that.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know what any of the items that you have returned here, amounting to $111,385.49, were expended for?

Senator STEPHENSON. A few.

The CHAIRMAN. Then we will go through the statement and see which ones you know about personally. Do you know what the amount of $5,000 was expended for which is represented by the check of July 18 to E. A. Edmonds?

Senator STEPHENSON. No; I do not. He might have stated to me what he expended it for.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know and can you state to the committee what it was expended for?

Senator STEPHENSON. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, taking the check to Puelicher, given July 30, for $10,000, have you any knowledge how that money was expended?

Senator STEPHENSON. He was to pay it over as Mr. Edmonds called for it. He was one of my treasurers, if you please, and Mr. Van Cleve was the other. I paid them the money, and Mr. Edmonds would call on them for the money.

The CHAIRMAN. As to the check for $30,000, on August 7, to Puelicher?

Senator STEPHENSON. That was all the same.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, you say you do not know what disposition was made of the larger items paid to Van Cleve and Sacket. There is, on August 20, an item of $15,000; on August 20, an item of $10,000; on August 31, $2,000; and on September 3, $13,500, paid to Van Cleve. You do not know what he did with that money?

Senator STEPHENSON. All of that money that was given to Mr. Puelicher and Mr. Van Cleve was to be given to Mr. Edmonds, my manager, as he might need it. That is all they had to do with it.

Further on, when the chairman was interrogating him in regard to some other expenditures, Senator STEPHENSON said (p. 31):

I will say right there that I know nothing about it only as that return was made to me. I had practically nothing to do with the canvass and knew nothing about it only as he made that return to me.

The organizing of this campaign committee is a very interesting illustration of applying "business methods" to politics. First, Senator STEPHENSON selected his campaign manager. Then he selected two treasurers. He deposited large sums of money in the hands of these treasurers, and then directed his campaign manager to proceed and spend whatever money is necessary to win the election. He also put in a confidential clerk, Mr. Rodney Sacket, one of the clerks in the office of the secretary of the senate, to be advisory, apparently, to his treasurers and his manager. Edmonds had no authority to pay out money direct, except $5,000, which was given him, apparently, as pocket change, though his personal expenses were paid by the treasurers.

The order of Edmonds for the expenditure of money seemed to be a check on the treasurers, because, apparently, they were not authorized to expend money except upon his order, and Sacket seems to have been a more personal representative of STEPHENSON's, who kept the accounts. So it will be observed that the Senator had his financial agents of this organization admirably provided with checks on each other; but it will be observed from the testimony that follows that he did not care to have any checks upon his field agents, or details as to their expenditures. Nor were the records in the bank kept so that they gave any special information that would be valuable to an investigating committee. There was no record kept in the bank of these disbursements. Puelicher paid the bills and received vouchers, but no account was carried in the bank and no checks, therefore, were issued against it. All of the financial transactions in regard to this Stephenson fund were kept in a memorandum by Puelicher, which was submitted to STEPHENSON.

son to convince him that the money had been expended, and then all records of it were turned over to Sacket after the campaign was over. Senator Husting, of the State investigating committee, in commenting upon this, said (p. 1914):

* * * Senator STEPHENSON was a party with Mr. Puelicher, Mr. Sacket, and Mr. Edmonds in providing a manner of disbursing money through the banks so that it might not be known whence it came and where it went, making it absolutely impossible, even at the present day, for any committee or anybody to go into that bank and discover what are a part of the campaign disbursements and what are not.

But it is not my purpose to extensively go into that phase of the campaign.

After the organization was completed, Senator STEPHENSON seems to have taken a fishing trip, having properly financed his scheme for election to the United States Senate. Now, let us examine the methods followed by this organization in spending over a hundred thousand dollars in the campaign.

There were a number of candidates for the legislature who were given money, some of them by STEPHENSON direct and others by his managers. To illustrate:

THOMAS REYNOLDS.

Thomas Reynolds was a candidate for the legislature from Door County. Mr. STEPHENSON admits, on page 25 of the testimony, that he paid Mr. Reynolds $180. This was made in two payments, one of $80, the other of $100. Mr. STEPHENSON says that at the time he paid him $80 he did not know that Reynolds was a candidate for the legislature, but that when he afterwards paid him $100 additional he did then know that he was an active candidate. These amounts were paid prior to the primary. After Reynolds had been nominated for the legislature, Mr. STEPHENSON then directed his manager to send him another $100, making $280 in all. When asked as to what he did with this $280, Reynolds stated, as shown on pages 1236 and 1237, that he had paid $1.50 to a man to circulate STEPHENSON's petition, and had employed a man on his farm whom he paid $1.50 a day for 26 days while he was in the canvass himself; and in accounting for the money, he put in the laborer's wages at $2 per day, counting 50 cents a day for his board. All told, he accounted for an expenditure in the campaign of $53.50. On page 1240 of the testimony, the following interrogatories occur:

The CHAIRMAN. Did you receive any more than $180 from Senator STEPHENSON, or from anyone in his behalf?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I received $100 from Senator STEPHENSON's manager.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that the $100 that you have referred to? Did you receive $280 altogether from Senator STEPHENSON or his manager?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I did not consider it from Senator STEPHENSON, although Senator STEPHENSON told me afterwards that he told them to send it to me—I supposed for my services; I do not know for what.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you receive $280 altogether from Senator STEPHENSON?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Yes, sir.

Reynolds was nominated and elected to the legislature and voted for STEPHENSON. He states that when he received the first $80 from STEPHENSON he did not know that he would run for the legislature, that depending upon whether he could secure a man to work on his farm while he made his canvass. Having been able to secure the man, he then became a candidate, STEPHENSON about that time having given him another $100. After reading the testimony in this and other cases, no man with an open mind can doubt that Reynolds became a candidate for the legislature because of the contributions which STEPHENSON made, and without such contributions he would not have been a candidate. He was paid money by Mr. STEPHENSON himself; he became a candidate for the legislature and was paid more money; was nominated and received more money; was elected and voted for STEPHENSON. In my judgment, considering this from the standpoint of practical human affairs, Reynolds's vote in the legislature for STEPHENSON is as directly the result of the expenditure of this money as if it had been paid to him the day before he cast his vote.

L. H. BANCROFT.

L. H. Bancroft was a candidate for the legislature from Richland County. Senator STEPHENSON admits that he gave Bancroft $250, but says that he did not know at the time he gave him this $250 that he was a candidate for the legislature. While STEPHENSON states, on page 39 of the testimony, that he gave Bancroft $250, the record shows that it was paid by Puelicher, doubtless upon the order of STEPHENSON. Bancroft in his testimony says that he received the $250, and that it was after he had become a candidate for the legislature and his petition had been filed. He says that he expended this money in behalf of STEPHENSON's candidacy for the United States Senate and not for his own candidacy for the assembly; that he spent all of it for STEPHENSON in organizing the county. As the story is told by him, he was telephoned by Edmonds, STEPHENSON's manager, to come to the Stephenson headquarters at Milwaukee, which he did, and as a result of that visit he received the $250 contribution. On page 708 of the testimony Bancroft was asked:

The CHAIRMAN. Did you keep an account of the expenditures made on behalf of Senator STEPHENSON?

Mr. BANCROFT. I did not.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you make any memorandum at the time?

Mr. BANCROFT. No memorandum, no, sir; except to charge my memory with it as an incident.

The CHAIRMAN. How did you know when the Stephenson fund was exhausted?

Mr. BANCROFT. Because this money was laid in a separate compartment in my safe, and that specific money was paid out in paying these bills.

Bancroft testified that he paid this money out to different individuals to work for STEPHENSON in various ways. On page 711, he was asked in regard to the money that was given to these various "workers":

The CHAIRMAN. Did you tell them that Senator STEPHENSON was furnishing you with the money to have them do this work?

Mr. BANCROFT. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Did they think that you were furnishing this money yourself?

Mr. BANCROFT. I do not know what they thought, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. Did they know that Senator STEPHENSON was employing you to do this?

Mr. BANCROFT. I never told them. I did not consider it any of their business.

Referring to one of the men employed by Bancroft, the chairman asked:

Did he seem rather glad to have this opportunity to earn some money?

Mr. BANCROFT. Yes, sir; he did.

The CHAIRMAN. Was he under the impression that you were giving him the opportunity?

Mr. BANCROFT. I do not know what impression he may have had about it. I asked him if he wanted a job, and told him what I wanted him to do. Then I paid him for his time and his livery bills.

The CHAIRMAN. When was this?

Mr. BANCROFT. That was some time in August.

The CHAIRMAN. It was after your nomination papers were filed?

Mr. BANCROFT. I think it was; yes.

I might quote largely from the remainder of Bancroft's testimony, but it is unnecessary. It is admitted by all that after he became a candidate for the legislature before the primary he was called to STEPHENSON's headquarters and paid $250, which $250 he used in the campaign. And it is ridiculous for anybody to assume that this money could be expended in the way it was, for the alleged benefit of STEPHENSON, and Bancroft himself to receive no benefit of it. It was simply a part of Bancroft's campaign expenditures. Bancroft was elected to the legislature, and voted for STEPHENSON.

CHRISTIAN C. WELLENSGARD.

Christian C. Wellensgard was a candidate for the legislature from Green Lake County. This is the county in which Mr. Sacket, STEPHENSON's assistant manager, lived, and the testimony shows that the arrangement with Wellensgard was made by Sacket. On page 441 of the testimony the following interrogatories occur:

The CHAIRMAN. * * * I will ask you again about Wellensgard. On September 5 you paid him $250. What was that for?

Mr. SACKET. That was to reimburse him for money expended by him in Green Lake and Waushara Counties in the interest of Mr. STEPHENSON's campaign.

The CHAIRMAN. He was a member of the legislature that elected Senator STEPHENSON?

Mr. SACKET. He was.

The CHAIRMAN. And he was then a candidate?

Mr. SACKET. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you pay him that money?

Mr. SACKET. I did.

The CHAIRMAN. What did you give him the money for?

Mr. SACKET. To reimburse him for money which he expended in the interest of Senator STEPHENSON.

The CHAIRMAN. What money had he expended?

Mr. SACKET. He had expended $250.80.

The chairman of the subcommittee then referred to a report made by a committee of investigation of the Wisconsin Legislature, which contained a letter and statement from Wellensgard. This letter Wellensgard wrote to Sacket, submitting a statement of his expenses during the campaign. It was written after the primaries, and is as follows:

BERLIN, Wis., September 3, 1903.

Mr. RODNEY SACKET, Milwaukee, Wis.

DEAR FRIEND: Inclosed please find my bill against STEPHENSON. I wish you would please see that I get it. I haven't put in anything for cigars or what little I spent. Please let me hear from you. I beat Hitchcock by 347 majority.

Yours, truly,

C. C. WELLENSGARD.

(Indorsed:) Paid, 9/5/08. C. C. Wellensgard.

The statement shows on its face that Wellensgard rendered to STEPHENSON a bill for his campaign expenses after the primaries were over. He claimed in his testimony that this money was expended wholly for STEPHENSON, and not for himself. How impracticable such a proposition is is shown by his testimony, on page 845, when interrogated as to the payment of $30 to C. Burlingame and four men. Burlingame was a man alleged to have been hired to haul men to the polls on election day.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. If I do not interrupt the Senator, I will call attention to the fact that the Legislature of Wisconsin anticipated the expenditure of sums up to $5 for this very class of services and exempted them from the accounts to be filed. So that, although he has done so, he was not required to account for sums of $5 or less paid out on election day. The legislature evidently contemplated what it deemed to be the necessity of getting people to the polls, so that the failure to account for any of those items would not be a violation of the statute of Wisconsin.

Mr. BRISTOW. It might not be a violation of the statute of Wisconsin, but if $2 or $3 or $4 or $5 is expended for the purpose of inducing men to go to the polls and vote who otherwise would not have gone to the polls and voted, then, in my judgment, it was an improper and corrupt use of money in an election. It is not a question of what the statutes of the State of Wisconsin forbade; it is a question as to what men did.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I am in accord to a certain extent with the sentiment which he expresses. I have never believed that it was within the proprieties to haul people to the polls, but the Legislature of Wisconsin evidently did consider it a legitimate expense.

Mr. BRISTOW. I think as we proceed the evidence will show that very large amounts of money were expended and given to men, not for the purpose of hauling them to the polls but to induce them to go to the polls and vote. That, at least, is the construction that I put on the testimony.

The chairman of the subcommittee asked Wellensgard—

Would you feel justified in permitting Senator STEPHENSON's money to be spent for hauling to the polls men who were not known to be favorable to him?

This testimony I am reading for the purpose of showing how impossible it was for this money to have been expended as it was expended by Wellensgard, a candidate for the legislature, in Mr. STEPHENSON's interest and not in his own.

Mr. WELLENSGARD. I had no ways or means to know. The men were hired for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. Was it not your duty to know, if you undertook to spend his money?

Mr. WELLENSGARD. It might have been my duty; but I had not seen these men or had any talk with them.

The CHAIRMAN. That is evident. You hired another man to gather them up and employ them on behalf of Senator STEPHENSON. Was it not your duty to know that none but Senator STEPHENSON's friends were employed?

Mr. WELLENSGARD. They might have voted for me and not have voted for Senator STEPHENSON.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the point I was after.

Mr. WELLENSGARD. I do not know how they voted.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be that the hauling of these men to the polls with Senator STEPHENSON's money inured to your benefit and not to his benefit. Is that true?

Mr. WELLENSGARD. That, of course, I could not say.

The CHAIRMAN. They did not vote against you, did they?

Mr. WELLENSGARD. I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. You would have something to say to the man who hauled men to the polls to vote against you, would you not?

Mr. WELLENSGARD. I do not think that I saw this man Burlingame but once after the time that I was there to see him. I think I only saw him twice during the primary.

The entire testimony of Wellensgard is evasive and shows an utter lack of frankness. His statement rendered to STEPHENSON shows that he paid Burlingame, on August 28, $30. In one part of his testimony he stated that he paid Burlingame in July. In regard to this statement the chairman asked (p. 848):

Had you not better abandon that proposition on the recollection of the facts—your claim that you paid this money in July? Look at that account and get your mind actively to work.

Mr. WELLENSGARD. I would not swear to the date that I paid it.

The CHAIRMAN. Why do you want to controvert the date set forth in your memorandum?

Mr. WELLENSGARD. I would not like to swear to it that it was in August, on the 28th of August, if it should have been some other date.

The CHAIRMAN. If you paid it for the purpose you stated you did, the 28th of August was an appropriate time to be paying it. Why do you want to transfer the date back to an inappropriate time?

Mr. WELLENSGARD. I do not seek to transfer it. I say I am not positive of the exact date that that money was paid to Mr. Burlingame.

In his testimony before the legislative committee in Wisconsin he declared that he paid Burlingame for posting bills and circulars for STEPHENSON in the village of Green Lake, where the enemies of Mr. STEPHENSON would tear them down as fast as they were put up, and that he kept Burlingame continually putting them up. In his testimony before the Senate committee he said he paid Burlingame for hauling men to the polls on election day, and went into details as to the distance the men had to be hauled. Apparently he had prepared to change his testimony and to find a basis upon which to reconcile the inconsistent statements on the 13th of October, 1911, more than three years after the payment had been made; and a few days before he appeared before the senatorial committee he went to Brookline, the home of Burlingame, and secured a receipt from him for $30, which receipt Wellensgard wrote out himself and had Burlingame sign; and in this receipt he stated that it was for circulating petitions and for men working on election day. Interrogating him further, Senator POMERENE asked (p. 859):

And when you arranged to have these several men haul voters to the polls, you expected that the voters that would be hauled to the polls would vote for both you and Senator STEPHENSON?

Mr. WELLENSGARD. We did not draw any lines as to whom we drew to the polls. There were men in Berlin than ran automobiles—

S Senator POMERENE. You did not expect anyone who was hauled to the polls to vote against Senator STEPHENSON, did you?

Mr. WELLENSGARD. I have no way of knowing how they voted.

S Senator POMERENE. Nor did you expect any such person to vote against you?

Mr. WELLENSGARD. I never asked them how they voted.

S Senator POMERENE. Nor did you expect any such person to vote against you?

The Senator seems to have repeated the question.

Mr. WELLENSGARD. That I could not say—how they voted. We got them to the polls whether they voted for one man or the other.

S Senator POMERENE. As a matter of fact, the men whom you employed and to whom you paid money you expected to vote for and support both you and Senator STEPHENSON?

Mr. WELLENSGARD. I suppose they did. I do not know. * * *

Wellensgard's testimony in regard to all the items of the bill is just as indefinite and evasive as that which I have read and will convince any experienced and open-minded man that this money was used to hire the support of numerous individuals for himself and STEPHENSON.

Mr. REED. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. REED. Do I understand the Senator to say that the whole effect of this witness's testimony is that he hauled voters to the polls and paid for their transportation to the polls and did not know or undertake to know how they voted, either as affecting himself or Senator STEPHENSON?

Mr. BRISTOW. He avoided a direct answer to the question.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is possible that the whole sum of $107,000 was not expended at all; that a great deal of it was never expended at all. It is natural that those who received the money and did not expend it should try to make up accounts. It is unfortunate that such a thing should be—

Mr. BRISTOW. I think the Senator's observation is to the point. As we proceed, Senators will observe that a number of men refused to account for money which they admit they received, and I conclude that they refused to account for it for one of two reasons—either they received it and were expected to disburse it and did not, or they received it to influence them and were not expected to disburse it; one of the two reasons. Now, from the evidence and the statements made by the witnesses, it is for each individual Senator to conclude which was the case.

Mr. REED. Mr. President—

Mr. BRISTOW. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I desire to understand the remark of the Senator from Idaho. Did I understand the Senator from Idaho to say that probably $70,000 of the amount paid these men simply pocketed and did not use?

Mr. HEYBURN. No, Mr. President, I do not think I said anything on that subject at all—about $70,000.

Mr. REED. I could not hear distinctly.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will, with the permission of the Senator from Kansas—

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. As nearly as I can, repeat the substance of what I said; that it is possible, in accounting for these sums of money which were placed in the hands of persons, they did not expend it at all for any purpose.

They did what is sometimes denominated as "sunk" it. I say in the judgment of at least one member of the committee no such sum of money was expended as Senator STEPHENSON furnished to his agents. That is all that I intend to say, and I think that conclusion will find many seconds.

Mr. REED. Has the Senator an idea of the amount that was absorbed in that way?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I have not, and I did not feel that it would add anything to the information of Senators to start out on a drag-net proposition to convict a lot of men of being unfaithful even to an irresponsible trust. I could not see that any good purpose would be served by it.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator mean to say, then, that this was an irresponsible trust?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; it was an irresponsible trust from the standpoint from which I use that term. I do not know how the Senator would intend to use it. But when one man gives another a sum of money and says "you use that in my interest, to forward my chances for election," there is a moral and personal responsibility running from the party who receives it to the party who gives it, but when I used the term "irresponsible trust" I meant to carry the idea that it was not a trust enforceable under the law.

Mr. BRISTOW. I have now referred to three candidates for the legislature who received money and who were elected.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. BORAH. Do I understand that the evidence discloses that only three candidates for the legislature received money directly?

Mr. BRISTOW. Only three who were elected.

Mr. BORAH. One other question. Has the Senator been able to determine how much of this $107,700 is unaccounted for upon the showing before the committee?

Mr. BRISTOW. I have not been able to figure out accurately how much was unaccounted for, but as I proceed it will be seen that there were large amounts that were unaccounted for, and the testimony will develop in what way they were unaccounted for, and I think the Senator will find some very interesting data on that subject as I proceed.

Mr. BORAH. Further, you say there were three members of the legislature who received money direct. How many votes did Mr. STEPHENSON receive before the legislature as a majority vote? That is, what was his vote?

Mr. BRISTOW. There were 123 votes cast, and the Senator received 63.

The purpose of Mr. STEPHENSON—

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Kansas says three members of the legislature who were elected received money, leaving it to be inferred that there may have been an indefinite number who received money who were not elected.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator will excuse me, I will proceed to give the names and the number that did.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I thought the Senator was passing to something else.

Mr. BRISTOW. No; I will come to that in a few moments.

The purpose of Mr. STEPHENSON in giving these men money was to secure their friendship and support. To pay a candidate for the legislature money to secure his vote before he is nominated and elected is more of a gambler's chance than to wait until his election, because he may be defeated and not have an opportunity to carry out the obligations, but the moral turpitude is just as great.

These three candidates for the legislature—

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator pardon me? I do not want to interrupt too frequently.

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. But it should be borne in mind in connection with this statement that these three members of the legislature were ardent supporters of Senator STEPHENSON. He did not draw them from the outside or from the uninterested public. He had been elected to the Senate once before, and I merely call attention to that fact. He was not buying antagonistic votes.

Mr. BRISTOW. I expect to discuss that feature of it further along.

Mr. BORAH. I have observed that that statement has been made before, but where is the evidence of the fact that they had been Stephenson supporters previous to the time they received the money other than their own statement of the fact?

Mr. BRISTOW. As I remember the evidence on that point, it is the statements of the candidates themselves, possibly supported by Edmonds or Sacket or the parties who paid them the money. I hold, of course, that the evidence shows that at least one of these men never would have been a candidate for the legislature if he had not received this money; and from my point of view, if you pay a candidate for the legislature money, he naturally would state that he did not receive that money for his vote. To do that would be to confess he was bribed. So unless he is ready to make confession, he would take the other point of view.

Mr. HEYBURN. I suggest to the Senator further that a very vigilant watch was on guard there to find any flaw in Senator STEPHENSON's title to the seat, and had that statement not been true, as made by each of those men, there were men there who would have liked to have an opportunity to show it to be untrue.

Mr. BRISTOW. I hold, of course, that no candidate for the United States Senate has a right to pay money to men who are to vote on the senatorship when there is a controversy going on. If we concede that, we concede that corruption is possible and probable. We throw the gate wide open to all kinds of corruption.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. I think, however, notwithstanding the statement of the Senator from Kansas, that there is a vast difference in the strength of the proof as to corruption between paying money to a man known to be indifferent or unfriendly to you and who afterwards becomes friendly, as the proof is stronger that the money has its influence in controlling him, than to pay it to a man who is known all the time to be for you. But I have been unable to find in this record any evidence at all of the fact that these men were such men as would be said from their previous acts or previous relationship, political or otherwise, to have been for Senator STEPHENSON regardless of the fact whether they got money or not. I do not say it is not in the record, but I have not been able to discover it. It would be a very potent fact if we could discover it one way or the other. And the fact that they had at a previous time favored him, while a circumstance, would by no means be conclusive that they would have been for him at this time except for the money paid them. I have not examined this evidence closely, and it may be it quite sufficiently appears that they would have in all probability been for him in any event.

Mr. BRISTOW. My view is that the evidence, not with that definiteness which would be equivalent to a demonstration, but which would be satisfactory to a man familiar with the affairs of life, is that these men would not have been for STEPHENSON, with the possible exception of one, unless they had received this money.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I could not put my finger on the testimony at this moment, but my recollection is that each one of these men—

Mr. CULBERSON. On this side of the Chamber we have not been able to hear the controversy going on for the last 10 or 15 minutes. I ask the Senator if he will not address himself to this side of the Chamber as well as to the other.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My recollection is that the testimony shows that each one of these three men—Bancroft, Wellensgard, and Reynolds—was in the legislature of 1907, at the time Senator STEPHENSON was elected the first time, and that all three of them voted for him, which would be pretty strong evidence that they were friendly to him.

If the Senator will bear with me further, each one of them testified under oath that he was for STEPHENSON. Each one of them had been a friend of STEPHENSON of many years standing. I think Mr. STEPHENSON testified to the same thing. Now, will the Senator from Kansas undertake to say that with that sworn testimony before the committee, with the testimony that they had voted for STEPHENSON in a prior election, the committee ought to disregard the testimony and presume that each one of them had told an untruth about it, particularly in view of the fact that there was absolutely no testimony to the contrary?

Mr. BRISTOW. In regard to that, I desire to say that the testimony of Reynolds, in my judgment, shows that he would not have been a candidate for the legislature unless STEPHENSON had provided him with these funds, and he did not spend the funds. He admits that he kept the money; a part of it. What did he keep it for?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Who is that?

Mr. BRISTOW. Reynolds. He accounts for but $53.50 out of the $280 given him.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator means he does not account in detail.

Mr. BRISTOW. The testimony does not show that he spent it all.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Of course this is a long record, but my recollection is that each one of these men expressly said that they did expend it all.

Mr. BRISTOW. Reynolds did not.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But they were not able to account for every dollar of it; they were not able to say that they gave a dollar to this man and $5 to the other man, but they accounted for it in detail as far as they could. But each of them said he spent the money—

Mr. BRISTOW. No.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And spent it in STEPHENSON'S interest.

Mr. BRISTOW. Reynolds does not claim that he spent all the money. Reynolds made a trip into another county, outside of his district, and he had some expenses on that trip, and his time was worth something, and he considered that part of the compensation for the work he was doing for STEPHENSON. Wellensgard claims that he spent the money and made a statement. Bancroft claims he spent the money—

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask the Senator what he thinks of the testimony of these three candidates, that the money furnished them was used by them to nominate the Senator from Wisconsin here and not to nominate themselves in the primary?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do not think it is true. I do not think any man who is acquainted with human affairs, who has had ordinary experience with men who are active in political affairs, will believe that any candidate for the legislature who will accept money from a candidate for the United States Senate to be used in a campaign would use that money exclusively for the Senator and not for himself, or that he could do it if it was expended in the district where he himself was a candidate.

Mr. BORAH. There is another feature of the matter, which makes it more binding, it seems to me, and that is this: It would not make any difference how honestly a man intended to use the money in the campaign. He might think he was going to expend it in a legitimate way to secure his election, and he might spend it in a legitimate way, but after he had received it he would never thereafter be a free moral agent in casting his vote for the man for Senator. He would feel compelled to follow the line of action indicated by the payment. Naturally, if a candidate for the legislature received money from the candidate for Senator, and he spent the money in paying legitimate expenses, yet this candidate for the legislature would not feel free to refuse his vote to the man who had paid his campaign expenses. So there is a corrupting and wrongful influence working even if the money is used to pay legitimate campaign expenses.

Mr. BRISTOW. These three candidates for the legislature were all nominated and elected and voted for STEPHENSON. Without their votes he would not have been elected.

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator permit me? I have found the reference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have the reference now to Bancroft, at page 717.

Mr. BRISTOW. I said Bancroft claimed to have spent this money for STEPHENSON, and he said he was a friend of STEPHENSON.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will just call attention to his testimony at page 717:

As a member of legislature I voted for him on every ballot, both in 1907 and in 1909.

These men belonged to what they called the "old guard" out there. The other one, Wellensgard, says:

STEPHENSON, in legislature I voted for him on all the ballots; supported him during campaign; have always supported him; voted for him in 1907 when I was a member of legislature; had known of him for 20 years. * * * If I had not received anything it would have been the same; if he had not got the majority at the primaries, I should have voted for the other man who did.

The other one you will find up to the standard when I find his testimony.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator from Kansas will permit me right there, Mr. Reynolds testified at page 1249, and I think he testified on another page as well, when the question was asked—

Were you, in the legislature of 1907, a supporter of, and did you vote for, Senator STEPHENSON at that time?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Yes.

All three of them voted for him.

Mr. BRISTOW. Nevertheless, the evidence will show, and any Senator can read the testimony of Reynolds and in my opinion he will be convinced, that the reason he became a candidate was because he received this contribution from Mr. STEPHENSON and his managers. I do not know how other Senators look at this, but when a candidate for the legislature receives money from a candidate for the United States Senate, if there can be any honor in a transaction of that kind he binds himself to the support of that candidate.

Mr. HEYBURN. But he did not receive it for himself. He only became one of the assistants in the campaign for the purpose of hiring other men to do proper things.

Mr. BRISTOW. He was a candidate for the legislature.

Mr. HEYBURN. He did not benefit by the money.

Mr. BRISTOW. These three men were candidates for the legislature, and the testimony shows beyond any question that it was used for them and for supporting Senator STEPHENSON in every instance. It was used for the benefit of both. It could not be otherwise. I invite any Senator to read the testimony of the three members of the legislature, a part of which I have quoted here this afternoon.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield further to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator says quite emphatically that this money was used by these men for their own benefit and for the benefit of Senator STEPHENSON. It is very easy to make assertions of that character, but where does the Senator find any evidence which warrants it in the volumes of testimony?

Mr. BRISTOW. I find it in the volumes of the testimony.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Can the Senator show—

Mr. BRISTOW. I have read it in part.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But the Senator cited us to the testimony of these men, in which they say they did not do that.

Mr. BRISTOW. I have cited the Senator to testimony in which they said they hired men to haul people to the polls who voted for both of them.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. BRISTOW. The record will show, and I will let the record stand.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I remember very clearly what the Senator read from the record. One of the men, I think Wellensgard, said these men were brought to the polls, and he did not know whom they voted for. That is a very different thing from saying for whom they did vote.

Mr. BRISTOW (reading):

Senator POMERENE. As a matter of fact, the men whom you employed and to whom you paid money you expected to vote for and support both you and Senator STEPHENSON?

Mr. WELLENSGARD. I suppose they did. I do not know.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is not a statement that they did.

Mr. BRISTOW. Does any Senator believe, in considering this in a frank and open-minded way, that any one of these candidates would hire men to haul voters to the polls to vote for Mr. STEPHENSON and to vote against them? Is that human nature? The candidate for the legislature is involved, and he would be benefited by it. I say, does any Senator believe he would hire men to go out and canvass for STEPHENSON and get men to vote for the Senator who would vote against him as a candidate for the legislature?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 4 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 3812) to regulate public utilities in the District of Columbia and to confer upon the Commissioners of the District of Columbia the duties and powers of a public utilities commission.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from Kansas about how much further time he will take.

Mr. BRISTOW. It depends altogether upon interruptions.

Mr. GALLINGER. Probably the remainder of the day?

Mr. BRISTOW. Possibly; I hope not.

Mr. GALLINGER. While I was hoping that I would get an opportunity to proceed with the consideration of the unfinished business, I think the Senator from Kansas ought to be permitted to continue, and I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside. The Senator from Kansas will proceed.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Kansas or some member of the committee (and my inquiry is based on some reference that I am not at all able to call attention to now) whether or not that was a specific statute in Wisconsin that undertook to prohibit a candidate for the United States Senate from contributing funds for the election of a candidate for the legislature?

Mr. BRISTOW. Not specifically a candidate for the legislature.

Mr. CRAWFORD. There was no such specific statute?

Mr. BRISTOW. Not that I know of. There was a general statute which covered the case, in my judgment, and which I shall read later on.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I wish to ask another question, because the discussion is helpful to us all. I should like to know if it is the position of the Senator that money paid by a candidate for the United States Senate may be expended by a candidate for the State legislature who was for this particular candidate for the Senate before he received the money from him. If we assume that, therefore the payment of that money made no difference with reference to the position of that candidate for the legislature. Suppose the candidate for the legislature expended that money for some purpose that could not be called corrupt—it might have been for advertising in newspapers—the fact being that the money was paid by the candidate for the United States Senate to a candidate for the State legislature who was already in favor of this particular candidate for the Senate, the money being paid for some purpose not in itself corrupt—would the Senator contend that such a transaction is a corrupt practice? It might not be ethically so, but is it really a corrupt practice?

Mr. BRISTOW. There is no occasion to answer that question, because that is not this case.

Mr. CRAWFORD. There are no instances that would come within it?

Mr. BRISTOW. I think none whatever. My view is that because a candidate for the legislature may have been in the legislature before and voted at that time for a candidate for the United States Senate is not conclusive evidence that he would vote for him again.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is not conclusive that he would not.

Mr. BRISTOW. And it is not conclusive that he would not. In my opinion, judging these men from their testimony, if they had not received Stephenson money and had received Cook money at least two of them would have been for Cook and not for STEPHENSON. I think there is not any doubt about that from the testimony.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, these three men did testify, each one of them, that they had voted for STEPHENSON in 1907. Each of them testified in the most emphatic manner that he was a friend of STEPHENSON's of many years' standing, and each of them testified that he was a supporter of STEPHENSON, and that the payment of this money made absolutely no difference to them. The question I present to the Senators is whether or not, in the face of all that testimony, and there being nothing to the contrary, it is quite fair to assume that every one of these men lied about it.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator is wrong when he says, in the face of all that testimony, there being nothing to the contrary. These men denied that they supported STEPHENSON because of the receipt of this money. If they had not denied it, they would have confessed guilt, and if they had confessed, judging from other cases we have had before the Senate, they would have been denounced as men trying to blackmail and destroy the character of a United States Senator.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Their denial does not prove the contrary.

Mr. BRISTOW. But when they admit receiving the money and say that they were not influenced by it, we are left to judge whether or not they were by the facts relating to the entire transaction and the incidents of their candidacy. In my judgment, they were bound by the receipt of this money to Mr. STEPHENSON's candidacy, and no man can tell whom they would have been for if they had not received the money.

Mr. HEYBURN. Except that they had announced for whom they were.

Mr. BRISTOW. They had not announced for whom they were before receiving the money, unless it was Bancroft.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. WORKS. It seems to be assumed that the money must be traced to some person who has used it for corrupt purposes, or that it was placed in the hands of a certain individual who was a candidate, by which he himself would be corrupted. I want to know whether the Senator from Kansas has considered the broader view of the question as to whether the mere fact of placing in an election fund $107,000, without direction as to where it should go or without any knowledge as to where it shall go, is not of itself a corrupting influence in the conduct of an election which would affect the title to the office?

Mr. BRISTOW. I undertake to cover that point later on. My judgment is that it does. That feature of the case I will discuss in connection with some other very heavy contributions.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield further to the Senator from California?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. WORKS. It has been suggested, I think, by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], that all these three members of the legislature, long-time friends of Mr. STEPHENSON, would have voted for him in any event. Is it not true that they said they voted for him because they were friends or that they voted because he had received the primary nomination?

Mr. BRISTOW. These men said, every one of them, as I remember the testimony, during their campaign that they would vote for the candidate who received the larger number of votes in the primary; that is, who should receive the Republican nomination.

Mr. KERN. That is Mr. Wellensgard's statement on page 861. He agreed to abide by the primaries.

Mr. BRISTOW. I think they all did.

Mr. KERN. And while I am on my feet—

Mr. JONES. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BRISTOW. As soon as the Senator from Indiana has concluded.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair begs pardon.

Mr. KERN. How would it be possible for a candidate for the legislature, such as Mr. Wellensgard, who admits practically that he took the money, went out and bought votes, to do so for Mr. STEPHENSON without at the same time, being the man who furnished the money, putting the elector under obligations to himself?

Mr. BRISTOW. I think it is impossible.

Mr. KERN. Mr. Wellensgard, on page 855, where he is accounting for certain small sums of money, where they were getting down to business, testified as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. There are several items on September 3 of sums of $5, $2, $4, $1, and $3. For what were those sums of money paid?

Mr. WELLENGARD. They were paid for ward workers.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you mean by ward work?

Mr. WELLENGARD. To get the votes out to the polls.

The CHAIRMAN. What kind of work?

Mr. WELLENGARD. I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you call "work at the polls"? What acts constitute "work at the polls"?

Mr. WELLENGARD. There are a good many of them out there that work in the quarry—quarrymen—and they come down there to work at the polls.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. What sort of a quarry?

Mr. WELLENGARD. A granite quarry.

The CHAIRMAN. What constituted "work at the polls"?

Mr. WELLENSGARD. They always have ward heelers that work around at the polls.
The CHAIRMAN. Were all these men watchers?
Mr. WELLENSGARD. I presume they were.

And so on in that line, where he shows on that page and the following that he pursued that line of conduct which is pursued in those States where votes are bought. The vote buyer is not going to a vote seller and say, "I will give you so much for your vote." The vote seller is not going to a vote buyer and ask him how much he will give for his vote. The proposition is always to evade the law, and he will say, "I will give you so much for this work." Every man who knows anything about politics knows that is the method by which votes are bought when men are engaged in working among what Mr. Welensgard calls "ward heelers." I submit to the Senator from Kansas it would be impossible for any man to take this large corruption fund and go out and distribute money to ward heelers for such a purpose as is indicated here without at the same time putting the ward heelers under obligation to the man who furnished the money which they needed so badly.

Mr. BRISTOW. I entirely agree with the Senator from Indiana. There can not be any doubt about it. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. Has the Senator read from the testimony of Mr. Bancroft in reference to his payment of money to Mr. Mehaffy?

Mr. BRISTOW. I have not.

Mr. JONES. I did not need to read it if the Senator had read it.

Mr. BRISTOW. I did not incorporate it.

Mr. JONES. It is contended that these candidates for the legislature did not spend the money that was given them in their own interest, but in the interest of Senator STEPHENSON. I think the testimony in regard to $100 of the $250 paid to Bancroft, in regard to his payment of it to Mehaffy, is rather illuminating; at least it does not show very great interest in behalf of Senator STEPHENSON. At page 709 of the record the following appears:

The CHAIRMAN. Give us the names of the people and the amounts you gave them.

Mr. BANCROFT. George Mehaffy I paid $100.

The CHAIRMAN. What was he to do for that $100?

Mr. BANCROFT. I gave him no instructions whatever.

Senator POMERENE. What is his address?

Mr. BANCROFT. Richland Center.

The CHAIRMAN. What did he do with the money?

Mr. BANCROFT. I could not tell you.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you ask him to render you an account of the manner of its expenditure?

Mr. BANCROFT. I did not.

The CHAIRMAN. Did he ever tell you how he expended the money?

Mr. BANCROFT. He did not.

The CHAIRMAN. Then you never knew?

Mr. BANCROFT. I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you ever know?

Mr. BANCROFT. I never knew.

Mr. BRISTOW. The 2,200 pages of testimony are full of such instances, and I am going to cite a number of them as I proceed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas a question. Does the Senator from Kansas think that any man with a nice sense of honor, with a decent sense of honor, in fact, being a candidate for the legislature, would permit a candidate for the Senate to be elected by that legislature to give him money?

Mr. BRISTOW. He would not. No man of honor who is a candidate for the legislature will accept money from a candidate for the United States Senate who will appear as a candidate before the legislature to which this man is to be elected, and the very fact that he accepts it is a presumption that it is given for a corrupt purpose. I think the time has come in the history of this country when the United States Senate should put the stamp of disapproval on all such transactions as that if it expects to maintain its integrity and retain the self-respect of the American people.

There were a number of other candidates for the legislature to whom money was given who failed of nomination. William L. Smith was given $250 by one Merritt C. Ring, one of STEPHENSON's submanagers. Ring was given between eight and nine hundred dollars to be expended for STEPHENSON in various ways, and he testifies that he paid $250 of it to Smith, who was a candidate for the assembly from Eau Claire County. Ring states that he gave this money to Smith to be used for STEPHENSON and not for himself. Of course, he used it to promote the campaign of both himself and STEPHENSON. It is unreasonable to believe anything else when they were both candidates for office before the same primary.

E. A. Everett was a candidate for the assembly from Vilas County, and was paid $250 of STEPHENSON's money by D. E. Riordan, who was a STEPHENSON submanager or scout under Edmonds. This was paid a few days before the primary election. Everett, however, failed to secure the nomination.

Mr. Edmonds also paid to one Shauers, of Oconto County, who was a candidate for the legislature, money to work for STEPHENSON. Shauers was not elected. Edmonds could not remember how much he paid him, but estimated it at from $100 to $125.

Not only did the STEPHENSON managers furnish money to candidates for the legislature, to be used in their own behalf and for STEPHENSON, but they undertook to bribe men to become candidates for the legislature, as shown by the following letter, which appears on page 1093 of the testimony:

J. A. ALWARD, Madison, Wis.

DEAR FRIEND: As I talked to you this evening over the phone I do not like to get mixed in any public matter of this kind, but, as I said to you, I will write the facts. A party came to me and wanted me to try for the nomination in the primary for assembly. He further stated that if I would try with the understanding that I would support STEPHENSON and the liquor interests I could depend on several hundred dollars for campaign expenses. Hoping this will not be used further than is a necessity, I am,

Yours, respectfully,

LESTER TILTON.

This offer was made to Tilton, who lived at Neillsville, Wis., by the same M. C. Ring who paid the $250 to Smith, candidate for the assembly in Eau Claire County.

One Norman L. James, who had a brother who was a candidate for the State senate from Richland Center, was paid $500, but he says he used that money for STEPHENSON, and not for his brother. He claims to have spent more than that in the Stephenson campaign, but fails to give any itemized statement of the purposes for which he expended the money. He makes the general statement that it was for hiring teams and distributing buttons and so forth. James was a business man—a lumberman and farmer. If this money had been expended in a legitimate way, in my opinion, he would have kept an account of it. It is an easy way of avoiding an embarrassing statement of facts that would incriminate, to make vague and indefinite statements as to the amount of money expended in elections, and the purpose for which it is expended.

The question frequently arises in the testimony as to whether these men that were hired by the various distributors of STEPHENSON's money were influenced because of the payment of the money to support STEPHENSON when otherwise they might have been against him. The testimony of Edmonds, Sacket, Bancroft, Welensgard, and others shows, in my judgment, that money was paid to men—I will state this as a fact—shows that money was paid to men who had not announced for whom they were for Senator, and had taken no interest in the campaign until they were employed; that statement is made time and again in many instances, and the representatives of STEPHENSON in numerous instances do not claim to have known whom these men favored for Senator prior to their employment. In the testimony of William R. Knell, on page 1778, referring to men he had employed, Senator POMERENE asked:

Can you tell us what their sentiments were on the subject of the Senatorship prior to the time that you employed them?

Mr. KNELL. I employed no one who I did not feel satisfied was a STEPHENSON supporter.

Senator POMERENE. Were they STEPHENSON supporters because you employed them?

Mr. KNELL. No. About the first question I asked of them was, "How do you feel on the senatorial question?" There were a good many of them who said, "I am for McGovern," or "I am for Cook"; and I said, "That is all right; that is your privilege; I do not want you on my side." I do not think it is fair to have men taken away from me, and I would not take away men from others.

He was a fine representative to turn over $11,000 to and to send out to canvass the city of Milwaukee for votes. He did not want anyone who was for anybody else.

Mr. HEYBURN. Do you think he ought to have taken the other position?

Mr. BRISTOW. If he had he would have confessed. I think it would have been the truth if he had taken the other position.

Senator POMERENE. Did you meet some men who were wholly indifferent about it?

Mr. KNELL. Oh, yes.

Senator POMERENE. And you employed some of them?

Mr. KNELL. I think I did.

Senator POMERENE. How many of them?

Mr. KNELL. Not many of them.

Knell was STEPHENSON's organizer in the city of Milwaukee, and expended $11,886 of his money.

Mr. HEYBURN. For which I think he got no vote.

Mr. BRISTOW. It was his business to get as many votes in the city of Milwaukee for STEPHENSON as he could, and yet he says in his sworn testimony that he did not want to take any voters away from any other candidates.

I want the Senate to consider this from the standpoint of reason and common sense.

Edmonds, during the campaign, employed a number of workers known as organizers, or "scouts," and sent them through the State. Some of them disbursed money for him. I have referred to one Merritt C. Ring, who was employed to go through Chippewa, Eau Claire, Clark, and Portage Counties and hire workers and organize the counties. Ring says, in his testimony, that he received eight or nine hundred dollars. Sacket's account shows that he was paid $645. Ring says that, of the money that he received, he handled $520 himself, and that the remainder was paid by checks from the headquarters. It was Ring who paid William L. Smith, a candidate for the legislature, $250. He also paid Mr. George E. Dee, of Chippewa Falls, editor of the Chippewa Herald, $150 for the support of his newspaper. Dee, in his testimony, on page 1223, in regard to his arrangement with Ring, said:

Mr. Ring came into the office, and at first I did not recognize him; I had not seen him for several years. He introduced himself, and we sat down and had a few minutes' conversation. He said: "How are you lining up on this senatorial question?" I said: "Well, I have been thinking it over for some time, and I have come to the conclusion that if I do any supporting in this campaign I am going to support Senator STEPHENSON. I think he is all right, and will do as well as anybody." We had a few more words about the Senator, and then he stated his proposition. He said: "I am glad to see that you are favorably inclined our way. I am representing the Stephenson campaign committee out in Milwaukee, and I should like to make a contract to advertise the Senator in your paper. I should like you to do it liberally, and to have you put in such articles as you think will advance his candidacy in this community." I told him that I was open to an advertising proposition at any time and with any candidate that was all right, and against whom I did not have any particular score. Then we talked a few minutes longer on what I would consider a fair price, and I named my price as $150. He said: "Well, that looks reasonable enough"; and he said: "We will pay that." I think he paid me $50 then and sent me $100 later, but I am not sure about that. But I got the $150 all right.

Senator POMERENE. Was anything said at that time as to the nature of the articles you were to publish?

Mr. DEE. He said to me: "You know your community here, and you know what would be effective advertising for the Senator." He said: "The committee at Milwaukee will send you such general articles as it is sending out. Then," he said, "we will probably send you some papers from other communities. Then," he said, "in addition to that, use your own judgment in printing what you think will help the Senator's cause."

Senator POMERENE. Was anything said as to how much space you were to give him?

Mr. DEE. He said that he wanted me to give as large a space as I possibly could for that amount.

Senator POMERENE. If I understand you, then, there was not anything said as to the amount of space he was to have?

Mr. DEE. I do not believe there was any definite arrangement made about the space.

Senator POMERENE. Then, if I understand you correctly, you simply agreed for a lump sum to support the Senator's candidacy through the columns of your paper?

Mr. DEE. Yes, sir.

Senator POMERENE. Had you had anything favorable to say of Senator STEPHENSON's candidacy prior to this arrangement with Mr. Ring?

Mr. DEE. I do not recall that I did. I had news items in the paper from time to time about the various candidates as they came up—regular press dispatches.

Dee also received $200 more of STEPHENSON's money, which he expended, he says, in hiring men to work on election day. In regard to the disbursement of this money, the chairman asked (p. 1221):

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I should like to inquire, in order that I may have a comprehensive and correct idea of the position of the Senator from Kansas, whether or not, in his judgment, that arrangement with the newspapers was a violation of law or propriety, having in view the direct primary system?

Mr. BRISTOW. I think it was a bribe, a corrupt act, and just as heinous as if it had been the purchase of the vote of a member of the legislature.

Mr. HEYBURN. It would be a cold day for the newspapers when a direct primary is the question, because they have been supporting it under the impression that it would give them a great deal of that kind of business. I know of one paper which received about $4,700 out of one direct primary through such means, and it has been the most ardent supporter of that system I know of.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator is entirely incorrect when he says that newspapers that support a direct primary are doing so because they expect financial gain from the system. No honorable newspaper man will support the proposition for that reason, and in my judgment very few of them do. Any newspaper that will sell its editorial support is guilty, in my opinion, of an act of corruption just the same as if a Member of the Senate should sell his vote.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POINDEXTER in the chair). Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. KERN. Does not the evidence of this man, Mr. Dee, show that his newspaper had not contained one single line favorable to the candidacy of Mr. STEPHENSON previous to the time he received the $150?

Mr. BRISTOW. It does.

Mr. KERN. On the contrary, does it not show that an article appeared in his paper discrediting the candidacy of Mr. STEPHENSON?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do not remember as to that article.

Mr. KERN. There appeared an article, in which it was stated:

"Cook shows gains in senatorial race," in which the Senatorship is discussed, and then there is this paragraph:

From a sure winner Senator STEPHENSON has dropped in the minds of the outsiders to third man in the race, surprising as this may seem.

That was explained by him by saying that it must have got in at some time when he was out of the office or when the city editor had charge. I think the fact was shown that this man Dee never published a line in his paper favorable to Senator STEPHENSON until he got $150.

Mr. BRISTOW. The record will show that soon after he got the $150 he published an editorial and not as advertising, that—

Mr. HEYBURN. May I ask this question: What, in the judgment of the Senator from Kansas, would be the offense if a man bought a newspaper and then it should come out regularly in his own interest? That has been known to be done.

Mr. BRISTOW. If a man is the editor of a newspaper, of course he has a perfect right, and it is his duty, to direct the policy of that paper along the lines that his conscience believes are the proper lines.

Mr. HEYBURN. I was speaking of owner and editor combined. Suppose a man buys the paper?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do not care to pass upon presumptive cases here all the afternoon.

Mr. HEYBURN. We are settling the moral question as to the status of the newspapers, and I wonder whether or not the Senator would put them in the same class. I have known of candidates buying 15 or 20 newspapers in a State in order to have a medium through which to reach the public.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. KERN. I submit that the difference between the two transactions is the difference between buying a man and buying property.

Mr. WILLIAMS. A man who bought a newspaper would have as much right to control it as a man who bought a horse would have a right to ride it, would he not?

Mr. BRISTOW. I think so.

Mr. HEYBURN. We shall get a good code of morals established here if we keep on.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Kansas, I will call his attention to the fact that this man Dee testifies with reference to the kind of advertising—

Mr. CRAWFORD. From what volume does the Senator from Indiana read?

Mr. KERN. From volume 2, page 1228.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you consider that advertising material to be charged against the $150 which had been given you for that purpose?

Mr. DEE. It probably would not look exactly like an advertisement, yet it was done in the interest of Senator STEPHENSON.

The CHAIRMAN. It was political work?

Mr. DEE. Yes; it was political work.

The CHAIRMAN. It was political newspaper work?

Mr. DEE. Yes.

Mr. BRISTOW. I continue to read from Mr. Dee's testimony. He was asked:

Did you pay out the money on the basis of so much a day—

I am now reading his testimony in regard to the $200 which he received after the $150.

Did you pay out the money on the basis of so much a day to men for their time in working at the primaries?

Mr. DEE. Yes; that was the rate.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the basis of your payment?

Mr. DEE. It ranged from $3.50 to $5 per day.

The CHAIRMAN. You have stated here that you paid some of them $3 and some $3.50. You were asked whether there was any difference between the methods of these men that accounted for the difference in the scale of wages. Was there any difference?

Mr. DEE. Where we wanted a man to work at a certain poll, and we could not get him for $3.50 or $4, and he would say he would do it for $5, we simply paid him $5.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you remember the largest sum you paid any worker?

Mr. DEE. Individually, I think, $5 was about the limit, because the amount was small in a large county like Chippewa; in fact, very small.

Dee was unable to mention the names of any of the men to whom he paid any part of this $200, and never rendered any account to the campaign committee for its expenditure. From Dee's own testimony it clearly appears that he sold the influence of his paper, whatever it was, to Stephenson's agent for $150. To buy the support of a newspaper in a primary election is a bribe and is just as iniquitous as to purchase the vote of a member of the legislature.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Does the Senator from Kansas take the position that it would be corrupt for a candidate for an office to advertise himself in a newspaper? I am not speaking of the question of taste, but would it be corrupt?

Mr. BRISTOW. It depends altogether upon what you call advertising. If it were display advertising and known to be advertising, the same as a dry goods company or as a store advertises its wares, I would not say that that was corrupt; but if it is an editorial comment, giving the moral support of the editor of the publication, then it is corrupt.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. What appears here, so far as this man Dee is concerned, as I recall it, is that he was in a measure to use his own judgment about the sort of matter he put into his paper. They were to send him some material from Milwaukee and he was to insert that material. I do not know that it appears—and for the purposes of my question I do not care whether it does or not—that it was to go into the paper printed as an advertisement; but suppose that a candidate makes an arrangement with a newspaper that that newspaper will print such matter as he may send to it—editorials clipped from other papers, laudatory articles written by anybody, would the Senator say that that was corrupt? I should agree with the Senator if he would take the position that it was bad taste to do it; but is it corrupt?

Mr. BRISTOW. Instead of dealing with a hypothetical case, I will deal with this testimony and read one of the articles that appeared as advertising matter, and answer the Senator's question, if he will permit.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am anxious to get the Senator's point of view.

Mr. BRISTOW. I will give it to the Senator by discussing the evidence direct. If he will permit me, I will now read one of the articles.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BRISTOW. I will, if the Senator will wait until I have answered the Senator from Utah. After the receipt of this $150 the following editorial appeared in Dee's paper under this head:

MANY FAVORABLE TO STEPHENSON.

The candidacy of Senator ISAAC STEPHENSON, of Marinette, is commanding a great deal of attention among the people of this section of the State. No matter what may be said about our junior Senator by those seeking to defeat him at the primary September 1, there yet remains a strong sentiment in the hearts of many Republicans that Senator STEPHENSON has been of much worth to his State, and that with all his years he is to-day a remarkable man. For his numerous good deeds and his clear and forcible common sense, he should be given consideration. Senator STEPHENSON was accorded the short term in the United States Senate, and ethics in politics demand his reelection to a second term. Very few are criticizing Senator STEPHENSON in this county, while we find good Republicans in the ranks who are in hearty accord with him.

That article is an editorial commendatory of Senator STEPHENSON.

Mr. KERN. Will the Senator read the next question and answer as to what he considers an advertisement?

Mr. BRISTOW. At the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana I will continue the reading:

That is the article that appeared in your paper, according to this record, on August 18, 1908. Was that after Mr. Ring had made the arrangement with you, or before?

Mr. DEE. That was after.

The CHAIRMAN. Was that article pursuant to your arrangement with Mr. Ring?

Mr. DEE. I should consider that an advertisement of the Senator.

That is an editorial, and it does not require any keen legal mind to determine whether this man, who had not supported STEPHENSON up to that time, who had published articles against him, but after he had received this money began to print this kind of editorial comment, did it because of the money. It was not advertising, but it was the sale of his editorial influence just as much as the sale of any influence that any man might have in a community.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, does the Senator call that a bribe?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Of course there must be two parties to a bribe—the person who receives it and the person who gives it. If it is a bribe, both of them must be guilty of some criminal offense. Under what statute of his own State or of Wisconsin does the Senator think the editor of this paper could be convicted of receiving a bribe?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do not know; I am not familiar with the statutes of Wisconsin, and not specially familiar with the statutes of Kansas on this subject; but it is not necessary to have a statute to know that this transaction was a corrupt and improper use of money in a political campaign.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think the Senator is confusing a matter of good taste with a matter of bribery or corruption. What I wanted the Senator to tell me was whether or not he thought, under any statute in any State of the Union, this editor could be convicted of receiving a bribe.

Mr. BRISTOW. I am not a lawyer, and I am not going to bandy words with the Senator about the matter. If it suits the Senator better to say it was corrupt, then I will use the word "corrupt," and say it was the corrupt use of money in an election.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator from Kansas will yield to me, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah a question.

Mr. BRISTOW. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Are there not generally in the States statutes providing penalties for accepting money or anything of value for a vote or for the use of influence in the election of a candidate?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not know how the statutes are worded. Of course, there are statutes that make it a criminal offense for any man to receive a bribe for the purpose of influencing his vote. That is true.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Influencing his vote, or for using his influence with others.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But I do not know of any statute which makes it a criminal offense for one man to receive from another money to go out and make speeches for him, if he chooses to do so, and certainly that is quite as culpable as receiving money to print advertisements in a newspaper.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I agree with the Senator that there is nothing in any statute I ever saw which would prevent a man who was for a given cause or for a given candidate from going out and making speeches for him and being paid for his time and his services and his expenses, but take the case of a man who uses the influence of his newspaper for the purpose of electing some one to office.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Well.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does not the Senator think that a statute which penalizes anybody for accepting money or anything of value for his vote or his influence in an election would cover that kind of a case?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It does not occur to me that it would, any more than—

Mr. WILLIAMS. The case of the Senator, I suppose, is a different thing. I can easily imagine, of course, that the Senator himself, in the next campaign, after the national convention of his party, might go upon the stump for the Republican national nominee and permit the Republican national committee to pay his expenses.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator can not imagine that of the Senator whom he is addressing, because he never did that and never expects to do so.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Nobody, I take it, would consider that the mere payment of the expenses of a man who needed his expenses to be paid would be corruption; but suppose that, in addition to his expenses, he was paid for making speeches, does the Senator think that that would be the right sort of thing?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I had not quite finished my answer to the Senator. I can not myself see any distinction between the case of a man who is employed to go out and use his tongue for the benefit of another and is paid for his time, and the case of the editor or owner of a newspaper who is paid for space in his paper. This editor apparently fixed his own price, $150, for the use of the space in his paper.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator and I would be agreed about that if it were merely a question of the use of space, but this matter seems to have been used in the editorial columns. If it were space bought, that fact was concealed by printing the matter in the editorial columns. It seems to me that the distinction made by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] is a true one—that it is the difference between the sale of a commodity and the sale of a man. A newspaper deals in advertising space and it might allow anybody to put any advertisement in that it chooses to receive and accept pay for; but if the advertisement is in the shape of an editorial, is it not a purchase rather of the editor than of the space?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No more than the payment to an individual who goes out and makes speeches is a purchase of the individual.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I will later on refer to men who were hired to make speeches that otherwise would not have been made, and that is just as improper a use of money as to buy editorial space. Of course, it is.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Then the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from Mississippi apparently disagree?

Mr. BRISTOW. We do not disagree at all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I said that where a man was paid for making speeches it was improper, but I could conceive that a man could make speeches and have his expenses paid in a good cause.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I concede it is improper; I concede it is bad taste; but the question that I am asking all the time is, Is it corruption? Is it bribery? Is it something for doing which a man could be convicted of violating a criminal statute?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator's question, then, is, Is it indictable? That, I think, is a different question, and, upon second thought—I seemed a moment ago to differ with the Senator about that—I doubt if it is indictable. I was thinking about the case of receiving money to influence another man by using the money with the other man, and that is a different proposition.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I was going to suggest there might be another and an additional distinction. I do not know that it would change the ethics, but it seems to me it would to some extent change the character of the case. Suppose what this editor wrote in the form of an editorial and for which he received pay was nevertheless an honest opinion and was true in fact, would that not be a different situation than if he had received money for stating something that was absolutely false? Is not a distinction to be made there?

Mr. BRISTOW. Whether a statement about a candidate is true or not may be a matter of opinion, but, eliminating these fine distinctions, the naked fact is that this man Dee sold the influence of the Herald to Mr. STEPHENSON for $150, and he says he did. I say that that is an improper use of money in elections. If a public speaker for a consideration agrees to go out and support a man in whom he is not interested except on account of the money paid him, I say that that is a corrupt and improper use of money in an election, not only on the broad principle of public morals, but I think it is contrary to the laws of the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield further to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. I had not expected to hear that statement from the Senator from Kansas, because it is very astounding in the light of the history of the past and of the promise of the future that a man can not within moral rules be employed to go out and make political speeches.

Mr. BRISTOW. I never made any such statement, or a statement upon which such a construction could be placed.

Mr. HEYBURN. When the Senator sees his remarks in print he will probably find that that is just what he said. The Senator, then, does not contend that it is unlawful or improper for a man to hire his time for the purpose of supporting a candidate by going over the country and making speeches?

Mr. BRISTOW. As we go along, I will demonstrate my ideas of that in dealing with other cases, which will answer the Senator's questions fully and completely.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator will pardon me if I seem to be a little persistent, but I have heard some most surprising statements here in the last few minutes. I should like to know if there is anyone who contends that it is a violation of the law or of propriety for a man to hire himself out to a political party or to a candidate to go through the country advocating the candidacy of a certain man?

Mr. BRISTOW. I will answer that in this way: In my judgment, any man who will hire himself out and, because of the money received, will go into a primary campaign—

Mr. HEYBURN. I am speaking of campaigns.

Mr. BRISTOW. And speak in behalf of a candidate. I say that the money expended in that way is an improper use of money in politics, and that in cases referred to in this discussion there were a number of them in Wisconsin which, in my opinion, were in violation of the laws of Wisconsin and in violation of public morals.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then, would it not follow that we should probe the sincerity of men who make political speeches in behalf of candidates in order to see whether or not the officeholder's title to the office is uncorrupted?

Mr. BRISTOW. If it is conceded that the expenditure of $107,000 in hiring men to support an individual for the United States Senate is a proper use of money in elections, then I say that you can concede anything so far as corruption goes in politics.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let us take the expenditure of $10. Suppose a man says, "I will go and make a speech at a certain place in your behalf to-night if you will pay me $10," and he goes there and makes the speech and gets the $10. Would that affect the title of the man to the office in case he should be elected?

Mr. BRISTOW. I think it ought to if it was a widespread practice.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator thinks it ought to?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do; yes, sir.

Mr. HEYBURN. Is it possible that the statements are untrue that men go out in campaigns and support candidates with whom they are not in absolute sympathy and ask the people to vote for them?

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator is begging the question there.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think not; I am putting one.

Mr. BRISTOW. The support of a political party before the people by a member of that party of course is taken for granted, unless there is some reason why he thinks he can not support its candidate, when he will bolt and support the candidate of the other party. I do not believe, personally, that it is proper to hire men, even by political committees, to go out in political campaigns.

Mr. HEYBURN. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. BRISTOW. But I think the question involved is very different in the case of a man supporting his own party candidates to whom he is pledged, because they represent his party principles, as compared to the case of the man who goes out for money and supports an individual with whom he is not in sympathy as the candidate of his party.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then, if it should transpire that a man should be paid within the next few weeks or months to speak in the interest of either of the candidates of either of the parties, he would be guilty of an act of corruption, would he?

Mr. BRISTOW. Does the Senator mean after the conventions?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; before.

Mr. BRISTOW. I think so. I think it is entirely improper to hire a man to go over the country to speak for candidates. I think it certainly is an improper use of money. Does not the Senator know that if you concede that such a use of money is proper, then you concede a possibility of unlimited corruption; and the man who has the "biggest barrel" is the man who will have an army supporting him? What are corrupt practices acts for if not to prevent just such things as that? Why did we pass a statute at the last session of Congress limiting to $10,000 the expenditure a candidate for United States Senator may lawfully make in his campaign?

Mr. HEYBURN. Because we were not in our right senses when we passed that statute. That is the best reason for it.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator may have that conception of political morals, but it is entirely different from mine.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will pardon me—and I am entitled to say this—I do not believe in the expenditure of money in political campaigns at all. I do not believe in a campaign fund such as we are accustomed to talk about being placed in the hands of a committee for the purpose of indiscriminate expenditure throughout the country. I have just as strict views upon that subject as has the Senator, but my views do not make a law; my views do not constitute a rule that shall expel from this body a man who has been elected under the general conception of political management.

Mr. REED. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. REED. It seems to me, if the Senator from Kansas will pardon me, we now have a pretty clear line of issue. Upon the one hand, it is maintained that no man's seat can be questioned in this body unless he has committed a crime under the statutes in order to get here, and, on the other hand, it is contended that if a man uses money so that the money is the determining factor, instead of the choice and purpose of the individual, that that is a matter that can be inquired into. I think the issue is pretty plainly drawn now that it is claimed on one side that, no matter how immoral an act may be, so long as it is not covered by a statute, we are without jurisdiction to inquire into it; and, on the other hand, it is contended there are acts of such moral turpitude and so detrimental to the public morals that if they are proven they may be considered.

Mr. HEYBURN and Mr. WORKS addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield, and to whom?

Mr. BRISTOW. I yield to the Senator from Idaho for a moment.

Mr. HEYBURN. Just for a moment to make a suggestion. Then, if a controversy were to arise over a game of golf between a candidate and another person, each charging the other with being dishonorable in his methods in regard to playing golf, would the Senator think that a controversy of a kind that might be inquired into by the Senate?

Mr. REED. Oh, no. But if we were in a golf tournament and a man charged with being guilty of irregular practices on being called before a board of gentlemen to have his acts inquired into should insist that, although he had violated and broken the rules of the game and all the rules of decency, he could not be expelled because he had not broken a statute, I would say, not knowing much about golf, that the board would inquire into his acts.

Mr. HEYBURN. Would the Senate?

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. WORKS. I agree with the Senator from Idaho that no money should be expended in a political campaign by candidates, and I have felt for a long time that one of the greatest evils in our politics, and one of the most consummate frauds, is the payment of money to newspapers for favorable mention or commendation. I can hardly conceive of a candidate for United States Senator advertising himself in a newspaper, and whenever he pays money for editorial comment it is a deception and a fraud upon the voter, for he is buying favorable commendation that does not come from the newspaper man because he believes it to be true. The Senator from Kansas says he is not a lawyer. I should like to know what view he takes of it as a newspaper man.

Mr. BRISTOW. I have expressed my views. No honorable newspaper man will sell his editorial opinions. Such action is just as dishonorable in the newspaper profession as for a Senator to sell his vote on the floor of the United States Senate.

Mr. WORKS. But is it not something more than that? Is it not a fraud in itself upon the voters who are called upon to exercise their franchise?

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly; and a fraud upon the readers of the paper. There can be nothing more dishonorable in the newspaper profession, in my judgment.

Mr. HEYBURN. That assumes, Mr. President, that the voter has no intelligent opinion and that he must get one from somewhere, either from the newspaper or from some indefinite source. The newspapers sometimes arrogate to themselves that degree of importance that all men form their opinions from the newspaper or from what it says. I think there is latitude there for some further consideration.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. BORAH. This argument seems to be proceeding upon the theory that the editorials in a newspaper would have some influence, as I understand.

Mr. BRISTOW. No; not at all. I do not know whether they had influence or not. It does not make any difference what influence they had. It was the sale of something which Senator STEPHENSON's managers evidently thought had influence or they would not have paid for them. They paid $150 for them, and they evidently thought they were worth that much.

Mr. HEYBURN. Suppose they bought him to keep him quiet, would that be an offense? [Laughter.]

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. I have no doubt that that is more often done than the other.

Mr. BRISTOW. Ring says that he also offered the editors of the Greenwood Gleaner and the Loyal Tribune $25 each if they would support STEPHENSON, but that they turned it down. In his testimony before the State investigating committee Ring stated that $25 was the amount of his offer to the Greenwood Gleaner and $15 the amount of his offer to the Loyal Tribune.

Mr. BRISTOW. Evidently he did not think that the editorial opinions of those papers were very valuable, for he offered them smaller amounts and apparently they did not come to an agreement.

Now, I proceed to another phase of the case that is very interesting, and that is a discussion of the testimony of these hired scouts.

Mr. HEYBURN. Before the Senator proceeds—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. To finish out the other subject, does the Senator think that it is the same offense in grade to hire a paper to be silent that it is to hire it to make a noise?

Mr. BRISTOW. I would not care to draw such fine distinctions. I think either would be a very improper use of money.

Mr. HEYBURN. Either would be equally improper?

Mr. BRISTOW. I would not say equally, but both would be improper.

C. C. Wayland was a business partner or associate of Edmonds. He received from the Stephenson campaign fund $1,199.34, of which he expended $887.65, retaining $311.69 for his services. Wayland, in his testimony, goes into more systematic details as to his expenditures than do a majority of the Stephenson workers or organizers. Practically all of this money was expended in Outagamie County. When asked what he did with the money that he expended, Wayland, who was quite a voluble chap, evidently, from his testimony, said (p. 729):

I selected the best men I could get who were for Senator STEPHENSON. I selected men who were not political hacks—I mean, who had been famous for being on hand at every campaign. I selected, clean, sober, industrious men who held positions paying from $2 to $5 a day. I selected them with a view to their wards, their nationalities, also their religious associations. I subdivided the nationalities—the Belgians, the Germans, the Hollanders—the Methodists, the Catholics, and the Lutherans. I interviewed some of the ministers; I made short addresses myself, when I could get a congregation at a picnic—get them around me. I put forth the best points of Senator STEPHENSON that I could find. I endeavored to harmonize the Half-breeds and the Stalwarts. * * * Sometimes I would drive all day, and I would not strike the man; so I would have those in the city who were acquainted out in the country make the trips for themselves and make a report. I then went over and quizzed the manager for Mr. Cook, and hobnobbed with him to find out the method of his campaign, to see wherein he was getting the better of it and where I was lacking. I furnished the cigars for my men, the object being that when you can get a man to stop and smoke a cigar long enough you can hold him still and talk to him.

The CHAIRMAN. What did you talk to him about?

Mr. WAYLAND. Senator STEPHENSON. I talked about why he should be elected, why the laboring men should vote for him. I looked up the number of saloons, and I found that there were 68 in the city and about 10 in the outskirts. Most of those on the outskirts had grocery stores attached. I found that from the hours of 6 o'clock to 10 o'clock there would be about 5 to 30 men in each place. * * * I got a man to go with me. He was a candidate for sheriff. I told him that I did not drink or smoke, but I wanted to see these people, and I wanted to present Senator STEPHENSON's case to them. I did not know any other way to reach them. He said that he could drink all I could pay for; that he could bankrupt the brewery. That is the way he stated it—and for me to take a cigar.

The CHAIRMAN. Did he smoke, also?

Mr. WAYLAND. He smoked, also.

The CHAIRMAN. So you hired a drinker and a smoker combined?

Mr. WAYLAND. I did not hire him. He went with me of his own accord.

The CHAIRMAN. You did the entertaining and he furnished—well, he shared?

Mr. WAYLAND. Yes; he shared. I invited these people to partake of a treat. That is the custom. The fact is, the first thing, the bartender wanted to treat us. I took a cigar. That is the custom there. I talked to them about why the workingman and the farmer should vote for Senator STEPHENSON.

The CHAIRMAN. You say when these crowds would meet in these saloons you would invite them to drink?

Mr. WAYLAND. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And pay for it?

Mr. WAYLAND. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you pay for it out of the money furnished you for campaign purposes?

Mr. WAYLAND. Yes; and I reported afterwards to Mr. Edmonds what I was doing, and he requested me to discontinue that kind of a campaign immediately.

This, Wayland says, was about the 20th of August, when he received instructions to discontinue that type of campaigning. There was one item of $315 in Wayland's expense account which, he says, was expended for workers before the primary and during the day of the same, and expenses incurred by several while advertising, polling lists, stenographers, and so forth. In regard to this item, he was asked (p. 731):

The CHAIRMAN. How much did you pay men for working on the day of election?

Mr. WAYLAND. I hired no one for the day of election, except the drivers. They were to get $3, I think it was; but the men I got were obtained early in the campaign, and put in their evenings, and then they were to work also on the day of the election. I gave them sums ranging from $5 to $15.

Of course, it is easily seen by this man's testimony that he went around and picked up men who were susceptible of influence by giving them a few dollars, and he gave them five or ten or fifteen dollars, and they agreed to hang around the saloons and talk for STEPHENSON in consideration of this money. That is a corrupt use of money in elections, and the Senate is to determine whether it indorses that style of campaigning. For one I do not.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator perhaps has overlooked the most iniquitous expenditure made by this man Wayland.

Mr. BRISTOW. I am not through with him.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It appears in his account somewhere that he paid seven pretty girls a dollar apiece to pin STEPHENSON buttons on voters. I hope the Senator does not approve of an expenditure of that kind.

Mr. BRISTOW. He paid $1.10 each.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That makes it all the worse.

Mr. KERN. In that connection I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Kansas to the item "Headaches, $17.15."

Mr. BRISTOW. Just wait. I had not overlooked that. Wait until I get to it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is a curious thing in this testimony. The witness says that the man told him he could drink all he paid for, until he bankrupted the brewery. The brewery was to be bankrupted by buying all that it had to sell.

Mr. BRISTOW. To resume:

The CHAIRMAN. How much did you pay to the stenographers?

Mr. WAYLAND. I do not know just the exact amount. One man I know I paid $15 for copying the Appleton polling list. I also sent that down to the headquarters in Milwaukee.

Thirty dollars was paid to a Mr. Schrader and a Mr. Birdstrom. In referring to this payment, Wayland said (p. 732):

"I met them and talked over the campaign with them, got their ideas of canvassing—they had had experience—and arranged with them that they were to canvass the township. They were to devote time to it as they saw fit, and on primary day they were to take, with their sons, rigs and start from different parts of the township and bring to the polls people who were found to be favorable to Senator STEPHENSON. I gave them $15 apiece for their work, and I bought a box of cigars for $4, to be used in canvassing when they were talking among the farmers, the idea being that when you stop a farmer's team, if he would smoke, he would wait patiently until you got through talking with him."

Mr. HEYBURN. The cigars acted as a hitching post.

Mr. BRISTOW. Apparently.

On page 734 of the hearings appears the following:

The CHAIRMAN. The next item is—
Livery rigs, busses, etc., autos for day of primary, and trips before primary day, including rigs for the month of August, $164.

Was that expended by you?

Mr. WAYLAND. Most of it was paid for by me. Different men who were employed by me made the trips. I paid the bills.

The CHAIRMAN. The next item is—
Cigars, $38.25, $14, $14, $7, 70 cents, 25 cents, 25 cents, $20, 15 cents.

Mr. WAYLAND. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that item intended to be separate from the one following it?

Mr. WAYLAND. It is a part of the one following. I separated that because this last money was spent in these saloons that I have mentioned, in these grocery saloons. I was willing to account for what I did.

The CHAIRMAN. Then there is the item, "Headaches (treats), $17.15."

Mr. WAYLAND. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Was that expended the same day that the money was expended for cigars and treats?

Mr. WAYLAND. No; they are different days.

The CHAIRMAN. The headache came along the next day, did it?

Mr. WAYLAND. In the morning after, I think.

The CHAIRMAN. I notice it is a subsequent item. Those all amount to $95.95. You paid for those out of the money given you from the STEPHENSON campaign fund?

Mr. WAYLAND. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The total amount received by you, you state, at various times during the entire campaign was $1,199.34?

Mr. WAYLAND. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What did you do with the difference between the amount paid out, $887.65 and $1,199.34?

Mr. WAYLAND. That was retained by me for services.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, you did charge for your services?

Mr. WAYLAND. Yes. Mr. Edmonds was mistaken in his testimony about my being paid in the primary. He was correct as to my not being paid anything before the legislature, but in the primary I was to receive pay for my services.

Wayland seemed to be a very useful "worker." When the legislature met Edmonds took Wayland with him down to Madison and kept him there until the fight was over.

Now, in my opinion, to give a man such as Wayland practically $1,200 and start him out to use it in the way in which it was used is a corrupt and improper use of money to influence men in an election. I can not look at it in any other way.

Now, we will take up another very interesting character in this testimony, Mr. Solon L. Perrin.

One of Edmonds's principal lieutenants was Solon L. Perrin, who lived in northern Wisconsin, and seemed to be in charge of the campaign in Douglas, Bayfield, Sawyer, and Washburn Counties. He received $5,000 of STEPHENSON money, and accounts in a way for $4,508.25 of it, retaining for his own services for the two months a little less than $500. Perrin was a lawyer, living at Superior. He was given this amount of money by the STEPHENSON managers, and never asked for any accounting of the way he spent it. When the investigation was made by the legislative committee, he submitted a statement to that committee, not as to what he paid the money out for, but as to when he paid it. In my opinion, there could not be practiced in any community a more demoralizing political corruption than that indulged in by Perrin. His testimony demonstrates him to be one of those political corruptionists who pollute the civic virtue of communities by disbursing large amounts of money during campaign periods. I will read the account which he rendered the legislative committee of the expenditure. He seems to have deposited this money in the bank, and this is the way he drew it out:

¹ Telegraph, telephone, and stamp bills, in all, about.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am not quite sure that it did corrupt the community, except, perhaps, one member of it.

Mr. BRISTOW. I will discuss that later.

I want to call attention to Perrin's testimony, which, I think, is very illuminating. Perrin was interrogated by the chairman of the Senate subcommittee in regard to a number of items contained in this statement. On page 656 of the testimony appears the following:

The CHAIRMAN. Check 276, on August 1: At that time you had received only $1,000. There is an item of $300 to C. R. Fridley, indorsed by him?

Mr. PERRIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. For what was that money paid?

Mr. PERRIN. That was paid to Mr. Fridley to aid in electioneering in Superior and in Douglas County.

The CHAIRMAN. You say "to aid." What was he to do?

Mr. PERRIN. He was to put out information and arrange to hire workers and in every way to further the interests of Senator STEPHENSON in that campaign.

The CHAIRMAN. "In every way" is a pretty general term. It might include legal and illegal ways. Being a lawyer, you can readily sift that out.

Mr. PERRIN. Every legal way.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; but what were those ways?

Mr. PERRIN. In order to make an effective campaign in Superior and in Douglas County, it was necessary to have a good many workers. He had been in politics for a good many years. He knew a great many men. He knew to whom to go to get the necessary assistance to work up the sentiment necessary to get out the vote for the Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. How did he work up that sentiment?

Mr. PERRIN. Well, Senator, I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. That is an answer, if you do not know. It is important, however, to inquire as to the acts that constituted "working up a sentiment," because it might be done in a legal or in an illegal way.

Do you know how he expended the money? Did he render a statement to you?

Mr. PERRIN. No; he did not.

The CHAIRMAN. Then do you know how he expended this money, all or part of it, in specific terms?

Mr. PERRIN. Not in specific terms.

The CHAIRMAN. Who is C. R. Fridley?

Mr. PERRIN. He is an attorney at Superior.

The CHAIRMAN. Is he an old resident?

Mr. PERRIN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is he an old man or a young man?

Mr. PERRIN. He is a man of 42 or 43 years of age.

The CHAIRMAN. Did he support Senator STEPHENSON for nomination at the primaries and before the primaries?

Mr. PERRIN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Was he in public life in any capacity?

Mr. PERRIN. No.

The CHAIRMAN. He was what you call a political worker, was he?

Mr. PERRIN. No. He was a practicing lawyer.

The CHAIRMAN. He was actively engaged in the practice of law?

Mr. PERRIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You never asked him for any accounting as to the expense he had incurred?

Mr. PERRIN. I did not.

I think that this fellow Fridley—and we will meet up with him again before the campaign is over—is one of those political "workers," as they are styled in this testimony, but in common parlance a local politician, who supports the man who pays him money. He does not account for this money in any way. He was not asked to account for it. There is no criticism of this man by the Stephenson campaign managers because he did not account for it. They did not expect him to account for it. In my opinion, he received that money for his influence in that community.

The CHAIRMAN. Pass that item, for the present, and take another one, on the same day, of $125 cash. For what was that cash expended by you?

Mr. PERRIN. I have no recollection.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you any recollection as to where it was expended?

Mr. PERRIN. No, sir. I can not tell whether that was expended in Douglas County or one of the other counties.

The CHAIRMAN. Does that represent money paid out by you?

Mr. PERRIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. No part of it was compensation to you?

Mr. PERRIN. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you any recollection of the persons to whom you paid it?

Mr. PERRIN. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Can you name any one person to whom you paid it?

Mr. PERRIN. No.

The CHAIRMAN. On August 5, $200 cash. For what was that cash expended, and by whom?

Mr. PERRIN. I have no recollection.

The CHAIRMAN. August 6, $25 cash. What do you say as to that?

Mr. PERRIN. I have no recollection.

The CHAIRMAN. August 6, $200. What have you to say as to that item?

Mr. PERRIN. I do not remember it.

The CHAIRMAN. When you say you do not remember, you mean—

Mr. PERRIN. I have no recollection.

The CHAIRMAN. That you have no information to give in regard to it, based upon your recollection?

Mr. PERRIN. None whatever.

The CHAIRMAN. On August 7, $100 cash. Have you any recollection as to the purpose for which that was expended?

Mr. PERRIN. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And on August 7, again, $75; and on August 7, again, $50; that is $225 on August 7. Have you any knowledge as to what that was used for?

Mr. PERRIN. Those items are all "cash"?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; they are all cash.

Mr. PERRIN. No; I have no recollection.

The CHAIRMAN. On the 8th we have cash items of $50, $50, $50, $50, and $50—$250; do you know the purpose for which that money or any part of it was expended?

Mr. PERRIN. Those are cash?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; cash items.

Mr. PERRIN. No; I have no recollection.

The CHAIRMAN. One of those is indorsed by W. W. Savage.

Mr. PERRIN. That is the same W. W. Savage who was referred to a few moments ago.

The CHAIRMAN. And the other is James Glynn.

Mr. PERRIN. He did not get the money on that. That was cashed in his place of business.

The CHAIRMAN. What does he do?

Mr. PERRIN. He is a saloon keeper.

The CHAIRMAN. What does Savage do?

Mr. PERRIN. He is my clerk. He is a clerk in my office.

The CHAIRMAN. And James Glynn is a saloon keeper?

Mr. PERRIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Was that money expended in the saloon?

Mr. PERRIN. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The check was cashed there?

Mr. PERRIN. Yes; we get checks cashed after hours wherever we can get the money.

The CHAIRMAN. On August 14, $250 cash. Who got that money?

Mr. PERRIN. I have no recollection, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you any recollection of the purpose for which it was paid out?

Mr. PERRIN. No.

The CHAIRMAN. This is all drawn against the $5,000—the thousand dollars and the other items that were paid you by Mr. Edmonds?

Mr. PERRIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. We have now passed August 4, on which you received the second thousand dollars?

Mr. PERRIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You have no recollection, you say, as to the $250 item on August 14?

Mr. PERRIN. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. On that day you paid out six items of expenditure, being $250, $25, $5, $50, $50, and $50. Those items are all cash except one of $5 to R. J. Shields. Who is R. J. Shields?

Mr. PERRIN. He is an insurance agent at Superior.

The CHAIRMAN. How long has he resided there?

Mr. PERRIN. More than 20 years.

The CHAIRMAN. What did you pay him the money for?

Mr. PERRIN. I have forgotten. I remember his coming in there and asking me for $5. I have forgotten what that was for.

The CHAIRMAN. You say he is an insurance agent. Does he engage in any other business than that of an insurance agent?

Mr. PERRIN. Yes. He is engaged in real estate to a certain extent, and I think they have some collections in their office.

The CHAIRMAN. Is he a detective?

Mr. PERRIN. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Did he ever engage in the detective business?

Mr. PERRIN. Not to my knowledge; except, perhaps, that he may have been a deputy sheriff at one time, early in the history of the city.

The CHAIRMAN. Is he the same Shields who testified in the Lorimer case before the legislative examining committee two years ago?

Mr. PERRIN. He is the same Shields who has been referred to in the Lorimer case.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you cooperating with Mr. Shields in forwarding the Stephenson campaign?

Mr. PERRIN. He was supporting Senator STEPHENSON, and he had some of this money to be used for electioneering purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. Was this $5 given him for that purpose?

Mr. PERRIN. Yes. It is a part of the Stephenson propaganda.

The CHAIRMAN. Can you account for any of the money, other than the $5 given to Mr. Shields, that you paid out on August 14? The items are marked cash items, and I will enumerate them a little more particularly. The $250 item on the 14th of August is cash. Can you account for any part of that?

Mr. PERRIN. I have no recollection.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you any memorandum from which you might refresh your memory?

Mr. PERRIN. I have not.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any source to which you could appeal to refresh your memory in regard to that item?

Mr. PERRIN. None whatever.

The CHAIRMAN. As to the next item of $25 cash, can you account for that or any part of it?

Mr. PERRIN. No.

The CHAIRMAN. * * * The next item on that day is $50 cash, and it was indorsed by C. R. Fridley. What have you to say about that? Can you account for any part of that money?

Mr. PERRIN. That was turned over to him to be used for electioneering purposes, and I never asked him for any statement of account.

The CHAIRMAN. What is Mr. Fridley's business, you say?

Mr. PERRIN. He is an attorney.

The CHAIRMAN. On the 21st you paid out $200 cash. Can you account for any part of that?

Mr. PERRIN. I have no recollection of it.

The CHAIRMAN. On the same day you paid out $100 cash. Can you account for any part of that?

Mr. PERRIN. I have no distinct recollection.

The CHAIRMAN. Again, on the same day, $40 cash. Can you account for that or any part of that?

Mr. PERRIN. I do not recollect that.

The CHAIRMAN. Was it money expended in the city of Superior?

Mr. PERRIN. The money was expended in four counties—Douglas, Bayfield, Sawyer, and Washburn.

(P. 662.)

The CHAIRMAN. On the same day, $100 to J. W. Wilson.

Mr. PERRIN. Yes; I recollect that.

The CHAIRMAN. What was that for?

Mr. PERRIN. That was paid to Wilson to electioneer for Senator STEPHENSON in Washburn County.

The CHAIRMAN. What was his business?

Mr. PERRIN. A locomotive engineer.

The CHAIRMAN. We come now to an item on August 24, $250 to T. S. Whitten. What was his business?

Mr. PERRIN. Mr. Whitten is manager of the North Wisconsin Lumber & Manufacturing Co., at Hayward, in Sawyer County.

The CHAIRMAN. What did he do with the money?

Mr. PERRIN. I am not sure that I ever asked him what he did with it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The Senator from Kansas has been on his feet for a long time; his address will occupy a considerable period yet he tells me, and I suggest that we now adjourn.

Mr. PENROSE. As the Senate will probably adjourn over for the balance of the week, I suggest that we have an executive session at this time. There are a number of nominations to be acted upon.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not understand that we will adjourn over for the rest of the week.

Mr. CULLOM. Let us go on with this case.

Mr. PENROSE. Then I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CULLOM. I was about to make that motion, with the consent of the Senator from Kansas.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 1, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we bless Thee for every movement which tends to solidify the human race into one great brotherhood, since whatever helps one people, helps all peoples, in the commercial, scientific, literary, art, political, or religious fields of endeavor, for Thou art a Spirit and they that worship Thee must worship Thee in spirit and in truth, and to be at one with Thee is the highest attainment for the individual, for the Nation, and for all the world. "Righteousness exalteth a nation while sin is a reproach to any people." Help us to live in Thee, through Thee, for Thee, that Thy kingdom may come and Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

AGRICULTURE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 18960, the agricultural appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the agricultural appropriation bill, with Mr. BORLAND in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 18960, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 18960) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913.

The CHAIRMAN. At the time the committee rose a point of order was pending on paragraph 1.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, the point of order made by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] was that the appropriation for the salary of the solicitor was without foundation in law. The reference made to the statute by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER], and an examination of the law, shows it does not establish the office of solicitor for the Agricultural Department; and I call his attention and the attention of the committee to the reading of that provision, if any of you care to examine it. Now, the law on the subject, it will be found by examination, does not go as far as it has been asserted. Section 161 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is as follows:

The head of each department is authorized to prescribe regulations not inconsistent with law for the government of his department, the conduct of its officers and clerks, the distribution and performance of its business, and the custody, use, and preservation of the records, papers, and property appertaining to it.

But that does not give the Secretary the right to establish an office. That right can only be obtained by act of Congress. Again, in section 169, same volume, is the following:

Each head of a department is authorized to employ in his department such number of clerks of the several classes recognized by law, and such messengers, assistant messengers, copyists, watchmen, laborers, and other employees, and at such rates of compensation, respectively, as may be appropriated for by Congress from year to year.

The classification of the clerks is set out in section 167 and none of these come under the title of solicitor; consequently the office of solicitor is not created by them and does not come under the classification of other employees, because the construction of that statute has shown that the word "employees" is construed otherwise. Now, the act establishing the Department of Agriculture in the first section provides as follows:

SEC. 520. There shall be at the seat of government a Department of Agriculture, the general design and duties of which shall be to acquire and diffuse among the people of the United States useful information, etc.

SEC. 521. The Department of Agriculture shall be under the charge of the Commissioner of Agriculture, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Now, section 523, which bears directly on this question, is as follows:

The Commissioner of Agriculture shall appoint a chief clerk with a salary of $2,000 a year, who in all cases during the necessary absence of the commissioner, or when the office of the commissioner shall become vacant, shall perform the duties of commissioner, and he shall appoint such other employees as Congress may from time to time provide, with salaries corresponding with similar officers in other departments of the Government.

Now, Congress has never established the office of solicitor in the Agricultural Department, and the act to which the gentleman yesterday referred as an authority for the position which he took does not sustain his position. I desire to call the attention of the committee to a reading of that provision. This is in the appropriation bill of 1910:

Office of the Secretary: Secretary of Agriculture, $12,000; Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, $5,000; solicitor, $4,500; and hereafter the legal work of the Department of Agriculture shall be performed under the supervision and direction of the solicitor.

Mr. LAMB. I would like to ask my friend if that does not fix the status of the solicitor and make it law?

Mr. CULLOP. No; I will say to the gentleman from Virginia it does not. With that language incorporated in that appropriation bill the only effect of it was to extend throughout the year for which the appropriation was made, and no longer, and the use of the word "solicitor" there was unauthorized by law, as the office of solicitor up to that time had not been created, and could not be created by making an appropriation for an office which did not exist under the law.

Now, Mr. Chairman, simply to make an appropriation misnaming an office for the salary of the person who performs the duties of the office under that misnomer, does not create the office. Offices are not created by such methods, and should not be. It is powerless to do so, and the effect of it, if allowed to remain, could exist no longer than the year for which the appropriation was made, so that using that language in that appropriation bill did not constitute the office of solicitor, and could not be used for the purpose of establishing a precedent for the purpose of claiming that it had been established by it for the reason it did not carry with it the weight of an act creating the office which was necessary for it to do. For this purpose it was insufficient.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, is it not a fact that a great deal of legislation that goes into the laws enacted by Congress is enacted upon appropriation bills? This provision does fix absolutely the title of solicitor and enacts it into law, and says that the legal department of the Department of Agriculture shall thereafter be under the direction of a solicitor.

Mr. CULLOP. Oh, well; but the gentleman misconstrues the effect of legislation and the effect of the language used in that appropriation bill. The word "hereafter," as used there, has no such effect as gentlemen attribute to it.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CULLOP. In a moment, when I get through with this, I will yield to the gentleman. The word "hereafter," used in that act, could not be construed to extend beyond the end of that appropriation year—July 1, 1907. And there are no words in the act which could be construed to have the effect of creating an office by affirmative legislation of Congress.

Now I will yield to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Does not the gentleman, as a lawyer, think that if Congress had intended at that time to create the office of solicitor, there were enough lawyers in here who knew how to use language to have said, "There is hereby created the office of solicitor," or words of similar import?

Mr. CULLOP. Certainly; you are quite right. It makes no difference what Congress intended. That has nothing to do with the matter, if the language is insufficient to carry out its purpose. The fact is that Congress, when it used that language, did not use language that created an office, and that is the way the language in the end must be construed. Now, then, if Congress intended to have created by that legislation the office of solicitor of the Agricultural Department, it would have said so. It did not say so, nor did it use words that could be construed to mean that it intended to do so.

Mr. CANDLER. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER]?

Mr. CULLOP. Certainly.

Mr. CANDLER. Is not one of the primary rules for the construction of law to determine the intent of the legislative body? In the construction of law, if you can determine the intent, even though it should differ from the letter of the law, the intent would govern in preference to the letter of the law.

Mr. CULLOP. No. You are now asking me two questions in one. Let me answer the first one by saying never since we have had courts construing statutes. The language must be sufficient to declare its purpose. If you can put such a construction upon it, the language must be used in the act which authorizes the construction, and when sufficient language is used for that purpose, then the courts will construe it to mean what it was intended to mean. But courts can not write legislative words into a statute, and whenever they do they transgress upon their rights and their functions and usurp the functions of departments of government.

Mr. CANDLER. The universal rule of law is that if you can determine the intention of the legislative body it governs in preference to the letter of the law, and in order to find out the intention of the legislative body—

Mr. CULLOP. That is only true when the language is ambiguous, then the gentleman's rule is correct. But this is not ambiguous language at all. It is free from ambiguity, and therefore the construction or the rule that he invokes does not apply to this proposition at all.

Mr. Chairman, there is no law, I assert, creating the office of solicitor, and anyone who will make a search of the legislation of Congress upon this question will search in vain to find a single line of legislation which affirmatively establishes the office of solicitor for this department. And it never was intended when the department was established, as shown by the reading of the original legislation, that Congress ever intended to have this office established.

Mr. Chairman, I insist that the point of order made by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] has been well taken and ought to be sustained. I find by reading through the appropriation bills that the salary of this office has been growing admirably in the last four or five years. It seems to have been seed planted in fertile soil and it has outgrown its usefulness in that department. In other words, the salary is much more than commensurate to the work to be performed, and I therefore insist that the point of order ought to be sustained. [Applause.]

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, we rely for authority for establishing this office of solicitor upon section 523 of the Revised Statutes. It is true the gentleman read with a good deal of emphasis some other of the sections here, but passed smoothly over section 523. I call the Chairman's especial attention—

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I read section 523—every word of it.

Mr. LAMB. I did not think so.

Mr. CULLOP. I did. The second section which I read was section 523.

Mr. LAMB. Then I will read it again.

Mr. CULLOP. And I spoke on its provisions and the effect of it.

Mr. LAMB. It reads:

The Commissioner of Agriculture shall appoint a chief clerk, with a salary of $2,000 a year, who in all cases during the necessary absence of the commissioner, or when the office of commissioner shall become vacant, shall perform the duties of commissioner, and he shall appoint such other employees as Congress may from time to time provide, with salaries corresponding to the salaries of similar officers in other departments of the Government.

I invite the attention of the Chair to that phraseology:

And he shall, as Congress may from time to time provide, employ other persons, for such time as their services may be needed, including chemists, botanists, entomologists, and other persons skilled in the natural sciences pertaining to agriculture.

Then, Mr. Chairman, in addition to that, the agricultural appropriation bill carried year before last this provision, and I invite the attention of the Chair particularly to the significance of the word "hereafter":

Hereafter the legal work of the department shall be under the direction and supervision of the solicitor—

And thereby this office of solicitor, according to all the intent and purposes of the law, was created.

We know that the Navy and Agriculture Departments have solicitors not appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, but we confidently rely upon this statute law and upon section 523 for our authority for a solicitor.

Now, one word, Mr. Chairman, in reply to the suggestion that this solicitor has not been active and that his duties, onerous and burdensome as they are, have not been faithfully and efficiently performed. I know whereof I speak when I say that this solicitor has upon him a burden of duties and responsibilities, and that he has executed them faithfully and conscientiously and with ability.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there are other gentlemen here who would like to be heard on this point of order, and when they shall have concluded I will ask for a ruling.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I had the honor to report to this House the bill creating the Department of Commerce and Labor, and in the preparation of the form of that bill and the report there came up for consideration the question as to how you could provide a department which might be expanded from time to time by the addition of new officials without at the outset specifying the particular officials who should be appointed. For instance, when the so-called Department of Labor was created, the law creating it specifically provided the number of clerks and other minor employees in that department, which did not seem to me a very wise provision, because as the Government expands and grows and as bureaus and departments expand and grow it is necessary to add new employees, to add to the number of employees of a particular class.

We followed, in the creation of that department, the theory which had been formerly followed in the creation of some of the other departments, providing general language under which the Secretary of the department might appoint employees or officers in the department, subject to the appropriation by Congress for those offices. There is no department which has been created by a law specifying certain employees that are carried constantly on the rolls and provided for on the appropriation bill, nor is it feasible or possible by actual legislation to provide here the number of employees, or all the classes of employees, which may be needed five years from now. Neither is it practicable to provide each year by legislative action, apart from the appropriation bill, the number which may be carried in the appropriation bill. In my judgment, in the general provisions of the law in the creation of the Department of Agriculture you authorize the Secretary to employ various officials and employees in his department, including a Solicitor for that department.

Two years ago, following the time that the Secretary had created the office of Solicitor, for which we had appropriated for years, we inserted in the Agriculture appropriation bill a provision that the legal work of the Department of Agriculture and of the Forestry Service should be carried on by the Solicitor of the department.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] just stated that that provision was applicable to only that fiscal year. Mr. Chairman, for years it has been the rule of this body when it desired to make a distinction between a legislative provision in an appropriation bill which was applicable for only a year and one which should remain as permanent law to do it by the insertion of one word. That has been the construction of the House of Representatives and the construction of the Comptroller of the Treasury for years, that when you put in a provision leaving out the word "hereafter," that provision applies only to the appropriation for the particular fiscal year for which the appropriation is made; but when you insert the word "hereafter," it means that that becomes permanent law until changed by act of Congress. I have seen, time and time again, in the House when legislative provisions came in having the word "hereafter" in them that that was stricken out on a point of order because it made permanent law contrary to the rules.

And repeatedly on the floor of the House, when a provision was inserted without the word "hereafter" and designed only to continue for the fiscal year, when practically by unanimous consent it was determined in the House to make that a permanent act, so as not to include it every year in the appropriation bill, the word "hereafter" was inserted as an amendment and thereafter the provision was left out of appropriation bills. So that the insertion of the word "hereafter" in these provisions has been time and again construed to take the provision with which it is connected out of the rule that it should apply only to the fiscal year for which the appropriation was made and to make it law applicable to all appropriation laws thereafter passed, unless repealed by act of Congress. Under that construction I do not see how it is possible to avoid the conclusion that the Solicitor of the Department of Agriculture is provided by law, is recognized by an act of Congress, is authorized by law, and remains until removed by an act of Congress.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB], chairman of the committee, plants his whole case upon section 523 of the Revised Statutes. That section reads as follows:

The Commissioner of Agriculture shall appoint a chief clerk, with a salary of $2,000—

Mr. LAMB. The gentleman is mistaken about that. If he had listened to me, he would understand that I do not rest my whole case on section 523. I emphasized that fact.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, in order that we may understand exactly the situation, did not the gentleman say that under that section and in that section was found the authority for this appointment?

Mr. LAMB. I said one of the authorities.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman name another one?

Mr. LAMB. I quoted the language of the appropriation and dwelt on the word "hereafter," the effect of which has been so well elaborated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Then the gentleman plants his whole case on section 523 and the act of 1910. Is that right?

Mr. LAMB. Yes. That is strong enough.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Section 523 provides as follows:

The Commissioner of Agriculture shall appoint a chief clerk, with a salary of $2,000 a year, who in all cases during the necessary absence of the commissioner, or when the office of commissioner shall become vacant, shall perform the duties of commissioner, and he shall appoint such other employees as Congress may from time to time provide, with salaries corresponding to the salaries of similar offices in other departments of the Government.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Florida permit a question now?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. Is it not true that in every other executive department of the Government, wherever there is a solicitor, he is established by an act of Congress, as in the Treasury Department, the Department of Justice, and other departments? For every one of them Congress has passed an act creating the office of solicitor, but it never has done so in this department.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I think there are two departments in which the office has not been created. It certainly has not been created in this.

Mr. Chairman, I want to call the special attention of the Chair and the committee to this language, because the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole to-day has to pass upon the question as to whether or not this covert legislation shall continue in Congress. This is an important question. It involves the procedure of this House, and it involves the question as to whether Congress intends to abdicate any further powers to the head of a department of this Government.

Mr. CULLOP. I should like to ask the gentleman from Florida one other question. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB] said that a part of the authority for this appointment was based on the word "hereafter," used in the appropriation bill for this department in 1910.

Now, if the word "hereafter" was used referring to the work that should be performed by the solicitor and there was no such office established by law, would the words have any effect, and whenever the question was raised would it not be sufficient to prevent the appropriation for any such office?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I think so, and I am going to discuss the word "hereafter" later.

Mr. LAMB rose.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I prefer to go on with my argument, and then I will yield directly, but I must do it in my own way.

And he shall appoint such other employees.

I apprehend that no lawyer on this floor will contend for one moment that the solicitor of a great department is an employee. He is an officer under the law. He is not an employee, and any court in Christendom construing that statute would hold that that word applied to clerks, messengers, laborers, and people of that character, and not to a high official of the Government, such as a solicitor of a great department. It is folly to talk about that section applying in this case.

But, Mr. Chairman, another point. Even if the solicitor were included under the general term of an employee, then the argument of the gentleman falls to the ground, because the language is this:

He shall appoint such other employees as Congress from time to time may provide.

Not permanent, not fixed, not perpetual, as the gentleman from Illinois would have it, but such employee and such only for whom Congress may from time to time provide. That is the only kind of employee recognized in the statute which he may appoint. He can not appoint any of them until Congress shall provide for them. He can not appoint an officer, he can only appoint an employee, and he can only appoint him after Congress in its wisdom has seen fit to provide for that employee.

But the gentleman falls back on the appropriation bill of 1910 and says that that bill uses language like this:

That hereafter the legal work of the department shall be under the supervision of the solicitor.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what does the word "hereafter" mean in that connection? This was an annual appropriation bill. It was not a bill providing for officers or employees of the Government. It was not a bill creating offices; it was simply and solely a bill providing appropriations for one great department of this Government for one year. It had no force or effect after that year; and in that bill they said that "hereafter." Does that mean eternity? Does it mean 10 years, or 5 years, or 20 years, or 40 years? It means during the life of the bill that was being considered and passed. It meant during the time that the bill was in force, and that was 12 months.

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman's argument is correct, that "hereafter" was intended to confine the appropriation for one year, why was it necessary to use the word "hereafter" at all?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I do not know what was in the mind of Congress—I am not a mind reader—but I apprehend that the Department of Justice had been interfering with the "persimmons" in the Department of Agriculture and that they wanted to hold the thing under their control. This was an appropriation made to pay this man for one year's service—not two, but one—and they provided that during the time of his employment—and they could not carry it any further—that during that period the jurisdiction and supervision of the legal business of the department should be under his control and direction.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe the gentleman from Virginia and the gentleman from South Carolina both planted themselves on the proposition that it has been provided for by law. The gentleman from Illinois, the astute, learned, skillful leader of the minority, the gentleman who knows the rules and who knows Hinds' Precedents from lid to lid, or, as old Jucklin said, "from kiver to kiver," told you that there were plenty of precedents where this word "hereafter" had been construed, but he does not produce a single one. I defy him, I challenge him, to present to this House a single decision in consonance with his contention on the construction of that word in a statute. They cite no precedent; they cite no law; but the gentleman from Illinois says it is a good thing, and the whole burden of his argument is that it is a good thing to legislate this great power into the hands of the head of a department. I do not agree with him.

I think we have got enough of departments legislating in this country now, and I think Congress ought to do the legislating and let those departments do the executing of the law. Now, I want to call your attention, Mr. Chairman, simply to show how this matter has grown and how covertly it has been brought in in these appropriation bills, to this state of facts. There was no specific authority for the employment of a solicitor. In 1905 the agricultural appropriation bill carried a provision for an appropriation of $2,500 to pay a law clerk in the department—one law clerk. In 1906 that provision was the same, except the salary was increased to $3,000. In 1907 the provision was there, but increased to $3,500. In 1908 the same provision with the same law clerk, but it went to $4,000. In 1909 it went to $4,500, and in 1910 it went to $5,000.

Mr. CANDLER. Will the gentleman permit a question right there?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. CANDLER. Now that the history of the legislation in the House shows that it began with appropriation bills in 1905 and came along down under the various appropriation bills until 1910, when simply an appropriation was made for the salary of a solicitor, and that was the change then in the appropriation bill of 1910, which provided that hereafter the legal work of the department should be—

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I have been arguing that for some time.

Mr. CANDLER. But the question I wish to put is, Does not that establish beyond a question of doubt that that changed the status of this solicitor from what it was before and made him a permanent officer in the department by the putting of that word "hereafter"?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Not at all. Mr. Chairman, I want to be frank about this matter. I think that in the year 1905 the bill carried an appropriation of $2,500 for a law clerk. In 1906 the words "law clerk" were eliminated, and in their stead the word "solicitor" appeared with a salary only of $2,500. For the fiscal year 1906 the salary remained the same, $2,500, and that change in the term was made from law clerk to solicitor.

In 1907 the salary of solicitor was changed to $3,000. In 1908 it went up to $3,500, in 1909 to $4,000, in 1910, $4,500, and the bill contained a further provision for five law clerks—two at $2,000 each and three at $1,600. For the fiscal year 1911 the salary remained at $4,500 for the solicitor and a provision was made for 21 law clerks—one at $2,500, ten at $2,000, seven at $1,800, and three at $1,600. For the fiscal year 1912 the solicitor's salary was raised to $5,000, and in the pending bill another law clerk, for $2,250 is added. Mr. Chairman, I ask where in the name of God is all this to stop; the Department of Agriculture, created for the benefit of the farmers of this country, with a great legal establishment large enough to run the Department of Justice instead of the Department of Agriculture, and if the Chair thinks that this is at all a close question, if the Chair is in doubt, then I submit that the Chair ought to resolve the doubt in favor of the taxpayers and farmers of this country who do not need this great legal establishment in this department established for their interest.

Mr. MANN rose.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Does the gentleman desire to ask me a question?

Mr. MANN. I thought the gentleman was through. I was just about to reply to the suggestion he made in regard to a reference—

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I raised this point of order and I think, in all fairness, I ought to have the conclusion, and if the gentleman has any precedent I think that he ought to show me the courtesy of at least letting me have an opportunity to say something about it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman just challenged my producing them.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Well, I think the gentleman, in all fairness, ought to produce them while I am on my feet.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will yield for that purpose.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I yield for that purpose; yes.

Mr. MANN. There are many precedents, going back to the Fifty-second Congress, which was a Democratic Congress. The Committee on Military Affairs reported this item in the Army appropriation bill:

That hereafter no money appropriated for Army transportation shall be used in payment for the transportation of troops and supplies of the Army over certain lines of railroads.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman give me the citation?

Mr. MANN. Page 406 of the Manual. Without the word "hereafter," it was clearly a limitation on the appropriation. A point of order was made to it; and, in a rather exhaustive discussion on the subject, at the end the Chair ruled in this way:

But, on examining the proviso in the bill, the Chair finds that it is something more than a limitation upon the appropriation made in this appropriation bill, for it proposes to make permanent law, the language of the proviso being:

"Provided, That hereafter no money appropriated for Army transportation shall be used in payment of transportation of troops and supplies."

And because it proposes a permanent provision of law and not a limitation upon the present appropriation the Chair feels constrained to sustain the point of order.

The only thing in controversy was the meaning of the word "hereafter." Now, if that precedent is not sufficient, I shall be glad to give the gentleman a hundred or so more of them.

Mr. CULLOP. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. From what page in the Manual were you reading?

Mr. MANN. I read from pages 406, 407, and 408 of the last edition of the Manual.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman from Florida will permit, I would like also to cite to him a precedent on this very proposition and on all fours with it, in my judgment.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I yield for that purpose. Go ahead.

Mr. LEVER. In the consideration of the agricultural bill on February 4, 1909, on page 1880 of the Record, I find this situation: That the gentleman from South Carolina, I, made a point of order against the appropriation carried for the purpose of paying the expenses of the so-called Remsen Board. The point of order was debated at considerable length, engaged in by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLISON], myself, and others; and Mr.

FOSTER of Vermont, who was then in the chair, made this ruling:

The Chair desires to call the attention of the committee to the following language in section 523 of the Revised Statutes, being a portion of the organic act establishing the Department of Agriculture:

"He—

Referring to the Secretary of Agriculture—

shall appoint such other employees as Congress may from time to time provide, with salaries corresponding to the salaries of similar officers in other departments of the Government; and he shall, as Congress may from time to time provide, employ other persons for such time as their services may be needed, including chemists, botanists, entomologists, and other persons skilled in natural sciences pertaining to agriculture."

That was a section of the organic act, which I quoted to the Chair yesterday evening and which has been quoted several times since.

Now—

Says the Chairman—

that is very broad authority. The Chair also desires to call attention to the language in another statute—section 169 of the Revised Statutes—which reads as follows:

"Each head of a department is authorized to employ in his department such number of clerks of these several classes recognized by law, and such messengers, assistant messengers, copyists, watchmen, laborers, and other employees, and at such rate of compensation, respectively, as may be appropriated for by Congress from year to year."

The Chair then says:

This language has from time to time been held sufficient authority for an appropriation in a general appropriation bill, and it seems to the Chair that this language that has just been read is analogous to the language in the organic act of the Department of Agriculture.

That is the most recent decision of which I am aware upon that proposition. I will be very glad to furnish this to the Chair.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I would like to see it first.

Mr. LEVER. It seems to me, if the gentleman will permit, that this proposition ought to settle this question in the mind of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Florida to conclude his discussion on the point of order.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I submit to the Chair that neither one of these precedents is at all in point. Of course, this is the first time I have seen them, but I will call them to the Chair's attention, and I think he will agree with me when he hears them, and, when the Chair examines them closely, I know he will. Now, the point suggested by the gentleman from Illinois:

But on examining the proviso in the bill the Chair finds it is something more than a limitation upon the appropriation made in this appropriation bill, for it proposes to make permanent law, the language of the proviso being—

I ask the Chair's particular and close attention to this proviso:

Provided, That hereafter no money appropriated for Army transportation shall be used in payment of transportation of troops and supplies.

That applies to any appropriation that might ever be made by Congress for Army transportation. It was not limited to the appropriation in that particular bill. It applies to any appropriation. It was a specific, unqualified, clear declaration of law by Congress that no money hereafter appropriated for Army transportation should ever be used for the purchase of supplies, and so forth.

Can the Chair see any analogy between that proposition and the one here? Here is a proposition on an appropriation bill, appropriating for salaries, where it is admitted that up to that time the office had not been established, admitted that no Congress had ever established it, but had simply appropriated for it from year to year for the last four or five years; and in this annual appropriation bill Congress undertook to define what should be the duties, in a particular regard, of the solicitor during the term of his employment, to wit, one year.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. For a question.

Mr. LEVER. I hardly think it fair, Mr. Chairman, for the gentleman to contend that we have admitted that there is no authority in the organic act creating the Department of Agriculture for the employment of this solicitor. I hope the Chair will bear that in mind.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The Chair will settle all that question. I think you have admitted it. You base your contention on section 523. Now, here is a precedent cited by the gentleman from South Carolina—

Mr. LEVER. And we base our contention on section 523, too.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes; on section 523, and it does not go within 40,000 miles of this case, and I will make it so plain that the proverbial man without intellect need not err therein.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a portion of a decision rendered by the distinguished gentleman from Vermont

[Mr. FOSTER] when presiding over the committee. Mr. FOSTER's decision is absolutely right. I agree with him from beginning to finish, and it absolutely lines up with the argument I have been making on this section. The gentleman, if I recollect correctly—of course, it may have been for lack of time—did not call the Chair's attention to the particular question involved. Now, the point of order was made by the gentleman from South Carolina himself upon which this particular decision was had, and here it is—that part of it that applies here. Here is the portion that I understand from the gentleman he made a point of order on, and it was in the agricultural appropriation bill. Here is the language:

For official traveling expenses, telegraph and telephone service, express and freight charges, $85,000; for employing such assistants—

Mr. LEVER. That is the portion, I would say to the gentleman.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes; it begins here:

For employing such assistants, clerks, and other persons as the Secretary of Agriculture may consider necessary for the purpose named, in the city of Washington, $200,000; out of the city of Washington, $266,460.

After considerable discussion the Chair delivered his opinion. Here is what he says:

The Chair desires to call the attention of the committee to the following language in section 523 of the Revised Statutes, being a portion of the organic act establishing the Department of Agriculture:

"He—

Referring to the Secretary of Agriculture—
"shall appoint such other employees"—

The CHAIRMAN. It is not necessary to repeat the language of that section.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. All right. Now, the Chair says:

Now, that is very broad authority. The Chair also desires to call attention to the language in another statute, section 169 of the Revised Statutes, which reads as follows:

"Each head of a department is authorized to employ in his department such number of clerks of these several classes recognized by law, and such messengers, assistant messengers, copyists, watchmen, laborers, and other employees, and at such rate of compensation respectively as may be appropriated for by Congress from year to year."

The approval of the world, for he finds a market for his product in This language has from time to time been held sufficient authority for an appropriation in a general appropriation bill, and it seems to the Chair that this language that has just been read is analogous to the language in the organic act of the Department of Agriculture.

I said that in my argument. At the place where the gentleman from South Carolina raised the point of order it was an appropriation for certain clerks and employees not officers. Now, I draw a distinction between the solicitor, an officer of the Government, and a mere clerk, who is nothing but an employee, and I want to warn the Chair of the danger of this kind of legislation without a solitary precedent to support it. It is covert legislation that ought to be frowned upon in Congress, and we ought to give no more power to these departments than we are forced of necessity to give.

I insist that the point of order is well taken and that the Chair ought to sustain it.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a ruling.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule. The point of order is made by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] against the language in line 2 of page 2 of the bill—

Solicitor, $5,000.

It is contended by the gentleman from Florida that the employment of the solicitor is not authorized by existing law. Reference has been made to sections 169 and 523 of the Revised Statutes, giving general authority to the heads of the departments, and to the Commissioner or Secretary of Agriculture, by name, to employ persons in his department.

It is contended that this general language, while sufficient to authorize the appropriation for clerks and other employees in general appropriation bills, is not sufficient to authorize the employment of an officer of the dignity of solicitor.

It has several times been held that these two sections are sufficient authority of law for the making of appropriations in general appropriation bills for the number and salary of clerks and other employees of the departments.

In the opinion of the Chair a sound construction of such language would necessarily limit it to employees ejusdem generis with those named or indicated, and that it might not be extended by construction to the employment of officers of a grade or character not falling fairly within the general designation. It would scarcely be a sound construction that would permit an executive officer to reorganize his department under such general rules. If the employment of the solicitor rested upon these two sections the matter might not be free from doubt. But the employment of the solicitor by name rests also upon the appropriation law of 1910, in which the existence of such an officer is specifically recognized and a portion of his duties defined. The Chair finds that it has been held repeatedly that it is possible in appropriation bills to make permanent provisions of law by appropriate words extending the operation of the provision beyond the time provided by the particular appropriation bill, and the appropriate word used is the word "hereafter."

In section 3930 of Hinds' Precedents the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. JAMES R. MANN, made a point of order against a provision in the agricultural appropriation bill, using the words:

That hereafter, for the purpose of preventing the use—

And so forth. And in the argument of the gentleman from Illinois, which was the basis of the decision of the Chair, he referred to a decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury, in which it was said:

Usually the word "hereafter," when used in a proviso in such act, indicates an intention to extend the application of the proviso to future appropriations.

The opinion further stated that the word "hereafter" was not the only word appropriate to that purpose, and if the word "hereafter" were not used, the purpose might be gathered otherwise, from the general language of the appropriation bill, but that the use of the word "hereafter" would prima facie have the effect of turning a provision of an appropriation bill into permanent legislation.

In the opinion of the Chair, therefore, the language employed in the agricultural bill of 1910, using the word "hereafter," is sufficient to warrant a permanent creation of the office of solicitor of the Agricultural Department until by appropriate act of general legislation Congress shall reverse that enactment. Therefore the point of order is overruled.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. There are other points of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair's attention is called to the fact that the gentleman from Florida reserved points of order to further portions of the same paragraph. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Florida that if it is desired to discuss them, and he has any further points, the Chair will be glad to hear gentlemen, but if the only point be the construction of the same sections of the Revised Statutes, then the ruling of the Chair will cover it.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I want to make a statement of fact that refers to these points of order. Then the Chair can rule, for I do not care to argue the point. Lines 12 and 13, "one inspector, $2,750." I make the point of order against that it is not authorized by law, and, in the second place, it is an increase of salary of $250.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, this official represents the Secretary personally in securing information desired from individuals and organizations outside of the department, a position requiring a broad knowledge of the department activities, as well as rare tact and executive ability of a high order. The present occupant of the position has filled it in a most acceptable manner and merits the proposed recognition. The Secretary strongly recommends this small increase and the committee granted it. I concede the point of order.

Mr. LEVER. I understand the gentleman from Florida makes the point of order on the increase and upon the place itself.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes; I make a point of order against the place, and in case that is overruled by the Chair I make the point of order against the increase.

Mr. LEVER. As to the point of order on the place, Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I am not going to argue it; I will submit it to the Chair.

Mr. CULLOP. The chairman of the committee has conceded the point, as I understand.

The CHAIRMAN. The chairman of the committee concedes the point of order as to the increase, as the Chair understands.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. What is the Chair's ruling?

The CHAIRMAN. As to the employment of the inspector, the Chair is of opinion that he comes within section 169.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Then I make the point of order against the increase.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will sustain the point of order as to the increase in salary.

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Under the ruling of the Chair is the language "one inspector, $2,750," stricken out?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not within the province of the Chair to alter the wording of the bill, and if the point of order be made against the words "two thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars" the language goes out. The Chair is bound to so rule.

Mr. MANN. I understand that, but what I wanted to get at is just what goes out; whether the point of order strikes out "one inspector, $2,750," or just the language "two thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars." I ask so that an amendment may be offered later.

The CHAIRMAN. The ruling is confined to the words "two thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars."

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Now, Mr. Chairman, in lines 13 and 14, "one law clerk, $2,500."

Mr. RODDENBERRY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RODDENBERRY. The Chair sustained the point of order of the gentleman from Florida to one inspector, $2,750. In what status does that leave the provision?

The CHAIRMAN. The language of the bill will remain "one inspector," with no salary fixed.

Mr. RODDENBERRY. The point of order was against $2,750, and the Chair sustains it, and the entire compensation goes out?

The CHAIRMAN. The ruling of the Chair was that the compensation was not authorized by law, and the point of order was sustained against it, and the language as to the compensation is stricken out. The House may or may not provide a compensation.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Now, Mr. Chairman, in lines 13 and 14, "one law clerk, $2,500."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the chairman of the committee whether the compensation is authorized by existing law or is a repetition of the former appropriation?

Mr. LAMB. It is.

The CHAIRMAN. And there is no increase?

Mr. LAMB. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Now, as to lines 14 and 15, "one law clerk, $1,200," that is entirely new.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, in reality that is not a new place, as there is a clerk filling the position with the same salary, who is carried in a lump-sum roll and detailed to the Secretary's office.

It is merely a transfer of this position from the Forestry Service to the Secretary's roll, that is all; but the lump sum for the Forestry Service has not been reduced in this case.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the position remain the same?

Mr. LAMB. Yes; under the act of May 26, 1906, making the appropriation for the Agricultural Department.

Mr. MANN. He is getting this compensation now?

Mr. LAMB. Yes.

Mr. LEVER. The Chair understands that the chairman of the committee stated that this clerk is receiving the compensation. He is paid out of this fund, but he is transferred to the Secretary's roll in keeping with the policy of concentrating the legal force under the Secretary.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion the designation of a law clerk who was formerly something else will alter the statute.

Mr. LEVER. But the Chair will understand he was a law clerk carried in the law under the Bureau of Forestry. He is now transferred from the Bureau of Forestry under his present designation of law clerk to the Secretary's roll as law clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. In lines 15 and 16, 10 law clerks at $2,000 each. I make the point of order against those as not authorized by existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. No point of order as to salary?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. No; against the provision.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Lines 16 and 17, 7 laws clerks at $1,800 each. I make the point of order they are not authorized.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Lines 17 and 18, 3 law clerks at $1,600 each. I make the same point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. In line 22, 6 clerks at $900 each. I make the point of order there is a provision for 1 additional clerk, and it is not authorized by law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Florida, Does not section 169 authorize the employment of such clerks as Congress may see proper to provide?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes; it does.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Page 3, in lines 8 and 9, one construction inspector, $1,400. I make the point of order against the salary as an increase.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is made on construction inspector, page 3, lines 8 and 9.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. It is an increase of $200.

The CHAIRMAN. The point is that the salary has been increased.

Mr. LAMB. I concede the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order as to the salary is sustained.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. In lines 9 and 10—

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I can not hear the gentleman from Florida on account of the confusion in the Hall.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will endeavor to repeat the points of order as made.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. In lines 9 and 10, "two cabinet-makers or carpenters, at $1,100 each." I make the point of order upon the position as not being authorized by existing law. They are entirely new.

The CHAIRMAN. On page 3, lines 9 and 10, the point of order is made by the gentleman from Florida against two cabinetmakers or carpenters, at $1,100, the point being that their appointment is not authorized by existing law.

Mr. LAMB. This is merely for the purpose of consolidating two positions and simplifying the rolls; that is all there is in it. Under the new title it would be possible to employ either a cabinetmaker or a carpenter, as necessity arises. That is the explanation. They were carpenters before. They were carpenters in one place and cabinetmakers in another.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, that would certainly come under the general statutes authorizing the employment of employees.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that the construction placed upon that statute would authorize the employment of this class of mechanics and laborers. In section 3669, of Hinds' Precedents, a point of order was made against the employment of a telephone switchboard operator, and in the same section a point of order was made against the employment of a wireman, both of whom were evidently skilled mechanics. The point of order was overruled, and the point of order is overruled at this time.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Against lines 12 and 13, on page 3, "3 cabinetmakers or carpenters, at $1,020 each." I make the point of order that these positions are not authorized by existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is also overruled.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Line 15, "7 carpenters, at $900 each." I make a point of order against that. That is an increase of two carpenters over the last bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The former provision was for five carpenters?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. LAMB. The small increase was recommended to secure better workmen through civil-service certification. There are not many carpenters secured at $840 each, and those who are secured are not always up to the standard of efficiency.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in the province of the Chair to rule on the wisdom of the appropriation, but the authority for the provision seems to be clear.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I make a point of order against the increase of salary.

Mr. LEVER. Will not the gentleman from Florida reserve the point of order, so that I may make an explanation?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I prefer to make it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the chairman of the committee, the point of order having been made against an increase of salary—

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I will consent to let it pass and have that explanation made later.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the point of order. The existing law provides for five carpenters at $900 each. It is true it also provides for two carpenters at $840 each. This provision is for seven carpenters at $900 each. There is no increase in the salaries of the carpenters carried by the bill, but there is an increase of the number of the carpenters at $900 each. There is the same authority to increase the number of carpenters as there is to appoint any carpenter. It always has been held that where there was a class of employees at a salary, while you could not increase the salary of the employees of that class on an appropriation bill, you could increase the number of the employees at that salary. For instance, take the Post Office appropriation bill. It is absolutely essential that we increase the number of post-office clerks and carriers throughout the country. You can not increase the salary over a point of order on the Post Office bill, but you can increase the number, and we do that every year, and it has been repeatedly held that it could be done. And it was held in the old days, before the recent law on the subject, that where the Post Office appropriation bill carried so many clerks at $600 and so many clerks at $700, you could increase the number at $700 and decrease the number at $600, the salary of the class not being changed. Here there is no change in the salary of this class of carpenters at $900. All the bill does is to increase the number of that class, which, under the precedent, we have the right to do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. In lines 20 and 21, "one plumber, $1,200 each." I make a point of order against the establishment of that place as not authorized by law.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Page 4, line 1, "three mechanics, at $1,200 each." I make the point that that is an increase of one mechanic.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Lines 10 and 11, "total for the office of the Secretary, $279,380." I make the point against the increase of $2,930. The last bill carried $276,450.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, that is a very small increase.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is made against lines 10 and 11, on page 4, that the aggregate amount is an increase.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, that is a mere matter of convenience. If it is stricken out in the bill, it would not make any difference. It is a matter of convenience, as I have said, and is not subject to a point of order, because it is just the total of the sums stated before.

Mr. RODDENBERRY. Will the gentleman yield for a question? I quite agree if it was entirely left out it would be immaterial, but in view of the Chair's ruling on a previous paragraph, that $2,750 was subject to a point of order and went out, ought not the total amount be reduced that amount?

Mr. MANN. The total amount should be corrected in the end, and I say to the gentleman that it is usual and customary for the chairman of the committee having in charge an appropriation bill to ask unanimous consent that the totals be corrected according to the provisions of the bill, but it is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. LAMB. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the totals be changed and that the clerk be permitted to change the totals.

The CHAIRMAN. The question first to be decided is the matter of the point of order. The Chair is unable to see how a point of order could lie against a mere computation. Under the existing law the amount appropriated, if unexpended, is covered back into the Treasury. Nobody could receive any salary under it except those specified in the appropriation bill. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserved a point of order on the entire paragraph, and I desire to withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] reserved a point of order on the paragraph and desires to withdraw it.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LEVER. The Chair a moment ago sustained the point of order on page 2, line 13, as to the increase of the salary of the inspector. Is it necessary now—I am asking the Chair—to move to amend by inserting the old salary?

Mr. MANN. It is not necessary; but you have got to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that such an amendment to the paragraph is in order at the present time.

Mr. LEVER. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the bill on page 2, lines 12 and 13, by making it read "one inspector, $2,500," which is the present law.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from South Carolina a question. What does that apply to now?

Mr. LEVER. That applies to the inspector whose salary is $2,500, where an increase of $500 over his present salary was proposed. The Chair sustained a point of order as to the increase proposed, and I now move to restore his present salary.

Mr. CULLOP. What is the present salary?

Mr. LEVER. His present salary is $2,500.

Mr. MANN. Let the amendment be reported, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 13, strike out the word "seven" and insert in lieu thereof the word "five."

Mr. LEVER. No; strike out the words "seven hundred and fifty."

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, lines 12 and 13, strike out "two thousand seven hundred and fifty" and insert in lieu thereof "two thousand five hundred."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, on page 3 there is another amendment. I think the gentleman did not offer an amendment for the salary of one construction inspector. I understood the salary increase of $400 was stricken out.

Mr. LEVER. I move to insert the words "twelve hundred," there, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CANDLER. That is the old salary.

Mr. MANN. Insert after the word "inspector," in line 8, the words "twelve hundred."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER].

The Clerk read as follows:

One page 3, lines 8 and 9, insert after the word "inspector," in line 8, the words "twelve hundred."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. LAMB. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask to have the total changed on that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB] to ask unanimous consent that on all these paragraphs the Clerk be authorized to correct the totals.

Mr. LAMB. That is what I moved.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB] asks unanimous consent that at the conclusion of each paragraph the Clerk be authorized to correct the totals. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WEATHER BUREAU.

Salaries. Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I desire to reserve a point of order against the paragraph and to make the point of order against certain items in it, which I will name.

First, in lines 14 and 15, page 4:

One assistant chief of bureau, $3,250.

That is an increase of salary of $250, and I make the point of order against it.

Mr. LAMB. Will the gentleman reserve the point?

Mr. CULLOP. Yes.

Mr. LAMB. The official holding this position has been connected with this service for 35 years. He has been employed at his present salary for the past 10 years. He is a man of scientific training and attainments, and during the absence of the chief he is in charge of the bureau. The salary he now receives is believed to be inadequate to the duties and responsibilities of this position. Some years ago the salary attached to this position was $3,500. Afterwards it was omitted from the bill until the chief of bureau could become more familiar with the administrative work of the office and find a suitable man for the position, and as a result this place remained vacant for several years. In the reorganization of the Weather Bureau it was restored at the salary of $3,000. Without going into further discussion, I admit the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana make a point of order as to the creation of the position?

Mr. CULLOP. As to the increase of the salary—$250.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order as to the increase of salary is sustained.

Mr. CULLOP. The next is in line 19:

Twenty clerks, at $1,000 each.

That is an increase of one clerk.

Mr. HAUGEN. The Chair has ruled that we may increase the number of clerks, but that the salaries can not be increased.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has so ruled. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. CULLOP. The next is in line 21:

At $900 each.

That is an increase from $840 to $900. I make the point of order against it.

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman from Indiana reserve the point of order?

Mr. CULLOP. I will.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I concede the point of order, but I believe when I make the statement the gentleman from Indiana will not insist upon it.

The Committee on Agriculture agreed that we would adopt a method of dealing with the low-grade clerks in the Department of Agriculture. The present law carries 159 low-grade clerks, whose salaries range from $600 to $840 a year. A number of these get $600, a number $720, a number $840.

The Committee on Agriculture concluded that it was not fair for this great, rich Government of ours to expect a competent clerk to serve at the miserable salary of $50 a month in the expensive city in which this Capitol is located. We concluded that it was not just for this great Government to ask a person to live in the city of Washington and support a family and to be competent to do clerical work in one of our great departments at a salary of $720 a year. We believe the same thing with reference to clerks receiving salaries of $840. While we could not promote all of these at one time to $900 a year, we did believe that by adopting this method of raising the $600 clerks to $720, and the $720 clerks to $840, and the $840 clerks to $900, we were conferring a blessing upon these poor people who are laboring in these various departments.

I do not believe that the Government has the right to put itself on record in legislation favoring low wages. I believe that this Government ought to show itself to be a model employer. I believe that every manufacturing and industrial establishment of this country ought to look to this great Government in the fixing of their salaries. Now, this bill, I will say to my friend from Indiana, carries increases of the character described affecting 159 clerks. I would like to have my friend's attention, because I know him to be a great, big-hearted man, and I know that the mere statement will so appeal to him that he will withdraw his point of order.

This section involves the salaries of 159 of these clerks and increases the total appropriation in the very small sum of $13,000. The question was raised in committee, Will anybody make a point of order on this proposition? My own judgment was appealed to and I did not hesitate to say that there was not a man in the American Congress who, after knowing the purpose of these increases, after the plan had been explained to him, would think for one moment of making a point of order on the increase in the salaries of $120 for a $600-a-year clerk in one of these departments here. I did not believe that there was a man who would make a point of order against a $60 increase for a clerk who was getting $840 a year. It is the attempt of the Committee on Agriculture to do what has never been done in this House before, and that is, to go down among the low-grade clerks, the people who are getting small salaries, and expecting to support families upon them, to help them up and to give them a lift. The policy heretofore has been to increase the salary of the chiefs of the bureau, the high-paid men, and absolutely neglect to take care of men at the foot of the ladder working and struggling for a mere existence. I sincerely hope my friend from Indiana, in the generosity of his big heart, will withdraw the point of order and let this thing go through.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I can not yield at this time to the very kind solicitation of the gentleman from South Carolina. The policy has been all along to increase the salaries of the high officials of these departments, and not only to increase the salaries of the high officials, but to increase the number of them beyond what, in my judgment, is actually required for the good administration of the department. There has been no attempt in this bill, notwithstanding the admission of the gentleman who has charge of it about increasing the salaries of the high officials, to reduce the salaries of a single one of them or to reduce the number.

You are transferring by legislation functions into this department that belong to the Department of Justice. You are establishing a policy by the attempted creation of a legal department here that sooner or later will come in conflict in the administration of the law with that of the Department of Justice and bring about a complication of affairs. This legal department, in my judgment, for the better administration of justice ought to be eliminated from this department and restored where the law originally intended it to be, in the Department of Justice and not in the Agricultural Department.

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLOP. I will.

Mr. LEVER. I concede that there is a great deal in the statement of the gentleman from Indiana, and perhaps the Committee on Agriculture has erred in reference to the legal machinery of the Department of Agriculture, although the committee has followed former bills in this respect as far back as I can remember, and I have been a member of the committee eight years; but is the gentleman from Indiana willing to take the position that because the committee has erred in this one particular he must make a point of order against these poor devils at the foot of the ladder?

Mr. CULLOP. I want to say to the gentleman from South Carolina that he has taken a very bad example for the construction of this bill. By the overwhelming majority of the people of this country in 1910 they uttered a protest against the example which he has taken for the formation of this bill, and that is what I am trying to avoid—that you may drop into the same position to our great injury. Until the committee shows some liberal disposition toward the reduction of these high officers and their salaries, I expect to stand here exercising my right upon this proposition. I want to say further to the gentleman that there is no man on this floor that would go further to assist the poor clerks in increasing their salaries than would I. It is for the increase of the inadequate salary I stand, and I favor the reduction in all cases where salaries are too high. My position is well understood. But I do not want to do it at the expense of the people of this country without receiving some consideration in the reduction of the salaries of the high officials wherever they are excessive, and whatever he is willing to take from that class I am willing to add to the low-salaried man. I will be as liberal as he is upon that proposition. I will, I assure him, assist him all I can.

Mr. LEVER. I desire to ask the gentleman from Indiana if the verdict in favor of the Democratic Party was based, as I assume he assumes it was based, upon any feeling in the minds of the American people that the Democratic Congress proposed to refuse to do justice to the poor people of this country. Then if he assumes that, I confess I have not read my party's history right, nor do I have a clear conception of what its purposes are.

Mr. CULLOP. In answer to the gentleman I would say this: His assumption is fallacious because he assumes these employees to be all the people when they are only a small part of the people. It was the excessive appropriations, the extravagance of the Republican Party, that led the people of this country into changing the political complexion of this House and placing a Democratic majority in place of a Republican majority, and it will not suffice, Mr. Chairman, to say that it was put upon the basis that we would increase the salaries of the clerks in some of the departments at Washington. Many of them are useless, many of them could be discharged, and the business of the department properly and well administered and just as efficiently. Now, Mr. Chairman, I insist upon my point of order—

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. CULLOP. Or if the gentleman desires to speak, I will reserve it.

Mr. LAMB. I trust the committee will bear with me while I make a statement of facts which I think it is due to the Committee on Agriculture I should make. It is true, as has been so well stated by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER], that these increases in the small salaries for 159 employees only amounts to $13,000. Enough has been said of that. In the report of the committee attention is called to that fact and reasons for it given. Now, Mr. Chairman, on the other point made—and I am not going to discuss politics, but just business ties—on the point made that larger salaries have been increased, let me say to you that this carries only $3,400 in this appropriation, and I want you to consider the fact that 2,500 of these, the employees of the department, on the lump-sum appropriation have been transferred to the statutory rolls, and there is no opportunity for those people to get any increase of salary except through the action of Congress. Now, admitting that fact and then taking the further statement that this increase only amounts to $3,400 through this appropriation, you will see that the charge that we have been extravagant in making up this appropriation falls to the ground. I made the statement here when the last appropriation bill was up that in five years these increases for these high officials over $1,200 on the statutory roll had only amounted to $10,000 in the five years. In answer to the gentleman's suggestion that we have been extravagant in this appropriation, let me call attention to the fact that we have reduced this bill this year by $1,400,000, and so careful have we been about it that I do not think that the activities of the bureau have been disturbed at all.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. LAMB. And I appeal to the good sense and judgment of this Committee of the Whole that we can justify ourselves in this action.

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAMB. I do.

Mr. CULLOP. The gentleman misunderstands me. I did not say you have been extravagant. I said that the gentleman took the party on the other side for an example or criterion to make this bill up, and it was using the example of a party which had been extravagant. That was my remark. I have made no charge except by inference.

Mr. LAMB. We have reduced this bill over a million dollars, and I desire to say here that the Agricultural Committee has no politics, and that the members of the minority were just as active, careful, and suggestive as were the majority members of the committee.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I desire to ask the gentleman whether he considers it very much of an extravagance to raise a man's salary $60 or $75 a month when he is getting $600 or $720 a year?

Mr. LAMB. No.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. No; I do not either.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a ruling.

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Wisconsin rise?

Mr. BERGER. I would like to get the floor for two or three minutes on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I hope opportunity will be given to the gentleman. The point of order is reserved, and I will be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Chairman, I believe it is in bad taste for a gentleman who draws the comfortable sum of $7,500 from the poor working people of Indiana, Illinois, California, and the rest of the States, to object to a raise of salary for a man who gets $50 a month to $60 per month. If we are to cut down salaries, let us cut down the salaries of the $7,500 men. I am one of them, but I would rather see my own salary cut down than vote for starvation wages. I believe, based upon my investigations, that in this city it is simply impossible for a man with a family to live halfway decently on less than $1,200 a year. [Applause.]

And I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP]—and I wish he would listen to me, because he may be compelled to listen to another voice next November—I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to the fact that the Democratic Party was not put into control of this House because the Republican Party paid the clerks too much wages. The Democratic Party was put in control here because of the high cost of living and because the times got harder, and because the people, not knowing political economy, held the ruling party responsible for the change in business conditions. [Applause on the Republican side.] We are nearing an industrial crisis again, and the voters instinctively vote for a change of administration. But if the Democratic Party will keep up a policy of economy against the poor devil who works for small wages, paying $240 a year as you do to the poor charwomen and poor laborers—if the Democratic Party shall refuse to raise the salaries of clerks earning $50 a month—I promise the gentleman that the Democratic Party will be wiped out with an iron broom, and wiped out pretty soon. [Applause.] Another party, a new proletarian party, will come in and control this House—a party which is not going to save on small potatoes. So much I can promise.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois rise?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I wanted to say just a few words. I want to remind my friend from Wisconsin that this raising of the salaries of these men from $600 to $720 has occurred under this administration of the House.

Mr. BERGER. That is poorly enough. You do not need to be proud of it.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I simply wanted to remind him of the fact of these increases. I do not believe in raising the salaries of men who are drawing a large amount, but I do believe that men who work for the Government, or work for an individual, firm, or corporation, should be paid a fair salary, and I believe in it just as much as does my friend from Wisconsin.

Mr. BERGER. I am glad of it.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. And I believe that this House and the people of the country will sustain them in paying reasonably good wages to men who do the work. But I do not believe in paying high salaries—

Mr. BERGER. I do.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois (continuing): To men who do nothing.

Mr. BERGER. Discharge them entirely.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. You do not believe in that. You ought to wait until I get through with my statement. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, this increase that is given men here who work for $50 and $60 a month I believe is all right. But I am opposed to raising at this time the salaries of men who are drawing three or four or five thousand dollars a year, unless it is an extraordinary case.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. CULLOP. I want to be heard a moment in reply to some of the remarks that have been made. I have never understood it to be a valid argument that an increase of salary ought to be made because some other person draws too high a salary. "Two wrongs never made a right." I do not think that is good ground for the raising of salaries of other officials. If that doctrine was to be adopted, there would never be decreases of salaries, but a constant increase all the time and all along the line. Simply because somebody gets too much is no reason why somebody else's salary should be increased. Now, this is true that there is not a man in public office to-day, either as a clerk, as an appointee, or holding office by election, that has to continue to hold it. He can retire to private life and follow the pursuits of a private citizen.

This argument that because somebody is in office and can not live on the salary that is provided, therefore the salary ought to be increased, is not a good argument and does not appeal to me. Perhaps if the incumbent will resign his office you might find some other good patriot who would be willing to lend himself as a sacrifice for his country's good and take the office for a little while.

Mr. LEVER. I will ask the gentleman if the same argument would not apply to Members of Congress? You could get lots of men to serve for less money than is now paid.

Mr. CULLOP. Why, certainly; and I observe that gentlemen who hold seats now are willing to sacrifice themselves, as a universal rule, a little bit longer for their country's good.

Mr. LEVER. At $7,500 per. [Laughter.]

Mr. CULLOP. I did not vote for the increase of salary. I was not here then, and I understand now that when men who did vote for it go back to their constituents you can not find a man who was in that Congress who will say that he did vote for it.

Mr. MANN. Oh, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman can not state that as a fact.

Mr. LAMB. Let me make a statement to the gentleman on that. I voted on the roll call, and I am glad to tell my constituents when I go among them that I voted for it. [Applause.]

Mr. CULLOP. I am glad the gentleman did. But there was no roll call on that question, and there is where the difficulty exists.

Mr. MANN. And I may say that the Members who voted for that proposition have done that generally in their districts.

Mr. CULLOP. I understand that some did not, and hence were defeated, and I understand further that a large number of Members claim they attempted to get a roll call on that proposition, but could not. That is my information about it, and I do not vouch for its correctness.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is slandering his own body when he says that. He was not here then, and he knows nothing about it.

Mr. CULLOP. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that it is now claimed if a poll had been taken a great many assert their vote would have been recorded against that proposition, more than enough to have defeated it, but that they were unable to get a roll call. I do not vouch for its correctness. I was not a Member then and know nothing about the facts in the case.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is entirely mistaken in making that statement.

Mr. RUBEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to interrogate the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. CULLOP. I do.

Mr. RUBEN. It is only a little while since we had an appropriation bill under consideration here carrying $80,000,000—the Army appropriation bill. I will ask the gentleman if he came in here then and made a fight for a reduction of the Army bill?

Mr. CULLOP. I will say to the gentleman that I did so whenever there was an opportunity offered for it, except upon one proposition, and as to that I then said that the Government had entered into a contract, as binding as any civil contract that could be made, that it would not reduce the pay of the enlisted men during their term of service; and I said more, that the Government had no more right to break that contract than any individual had a right to break his contract, and that it was setting a bad precedent to the country for the Congress of the United States to do it. [Applause.] I believe contracts are sacred, and should be kept both in spirit and letter. I was performing my duty as I understood it then, under my obligation as a Member of this body, and shall continue to so act as long as I occupy a seat here.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a ruling.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is made against an increase of salary to persons receiving $900 each. The Chair understands from the chairman of the committee that that is an actual increase beyond the amount authorized by law?

Mr. LAMB. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the point of order must be sustained.

Mr. MANN. Is that the only point of order pending?

The CHAIRMAN. There are no other points of order pending to that paragraph.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, the next is an increase, but I will not make a point of order as to that. Now, then, in line 25, I see "one lithographer, $1,500." That is an increase of $200. I make the point of order against that. That is not a low-salaried man.

Mr. LEVER. The point of order is conceded.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. CULLOP. In line 2, page 5, I see "five compositors, at $1,250 each." That is an increase of one.

Mr. MANN. That is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. CULLOP. I suppose, under the previous ruling of the Chair, that will be overruled.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. CULLOP. Now, then, in line 11, I see "one engineer, $1,300." That is an increase of $100. I make the point of order against that.

Mr. LAMB. The point of order is conceded.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana one question.

The CHAIRMAN. There is nothing pending before the House.

Mr. ESCH. It can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. OLMSTED. I notice he omitted to make a point of order against one increase. Why was that omitted?

Mr. CULLOP. That was an increase from $720 to $840. I did not think a point of order ought to be made against it, as the salary is already low. [Applause.]

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to line 21, page 4, and insert "$840 each," instead of $900.

Mr. RODDENBERRY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RODDENBERRY. I desire to make points of order against certain items in the paragraph, and I wish to know whether I will have that right if the gentleman is now recognized for the purpose indicated by him.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB] rose and asked unanimous consent to offer an amendment to the language of the bill, but the Chair has not yet submitted the request for unanimous consent. If there are other points of order, the Chair will hear them at this time.

Mr. LAMB. I am simply offering an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the points of order on the paragraph before amendments are suggested.

Mr. RODDENBERRY. In lines 23, 24, and 25, on page 4, occurs the item:

Two assistant foremen of division, at $1,600 each.

I make the point of order that under the existing law there is one assistant foreman of division at $1,400, and that the present provision is for two assistant foremen of division at $1,600. The point I make is that there is an increase of the salary of the existing assistant foreman and an increase in the salary of a newly denominated assistant foreman of $200 each.

Mr. LEVER. Does the gentleman make the point of order or does he reserve it?

Mr. RODDENBERRY. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman from Georgia that the increase of $200 in the item which he has mentioned was made for the purpose of equalizing the compensation of two men who are doing practically, if not exactly, the same work in the same room, to put these two men upon an equal salary. We thought it was just that this should be done.

Mr. RODDENBERRY. In the existing appropriation there appears to be one assistant foreman whose salary is named at $1,400. This bill carries two assistant foremen to receive $1,600 each, an increase of $200.

Mr. LEVER. My recollection is that this is a change of title with an increase of salary of $200 for one of the men working in the printing office in the Weather Bureau. Both of them are doing the work of assistants, one in one direction and one in another. The purpose of the change of title is to put them on the same footing, and this increase would put them on the same salary.

Mr. RODDENBERRY. Can the gentleman inform us where in the act of 1911 the designation and salary of the person now denominated as an assistant foreman of division is to be found?

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman will find, on page 2 of the current law, about the tenth line:

One assistant foreman of division, $1,600.
One assistant foreman of division, $1,400.

We are equalizing the salaries of these two men.

Mr. RODDENBERRY. Mr. Chairman, I am indisposed to object, but I observe that all the equalizing that is done in these bills is by raising some fellow up and nobody's salary is reduced to do any equalizing. I must insist on the point of order.

Mr. LAMB. I concede the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is made that one assistant foreman is now authorized by law at $1,600 and one is authorized by law at $1,400. The point of order is sustained as to the increase of $200 as to one of these assistant foremen.

Mr. LEVER. This is really the creation of a new place. We have dropped one assistant foreman at $1,400 and have increased the number of assistant foremen at $1,600 to two instead of one. I take it that under the ruling made a moment ago we have a right to create one more place.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that under existing law there is one assistant foreman at $1,600 and one at $1,400. The provision of the bill increases the $1,400 foreman to $1,600. The point of order is made against the increase of $200. The chairman of the committee concedes the increase and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. RODDENBERRY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on page 5, line 11, "one engineer, $1,300." Under the existing statute, the current law, it is "one engineer, $1,200." I make the point of order against the increase.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the impression that that point of order was made by the gentleman from Indiana and sustained.

Mr. CULLOP. Now, Mr. Chairman, I reserved a point of order against the entire paragraph. I now withdraw that.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on page 4, line 23, after the word "dollars," by inserting "one" instead of "two," and in line 25, after the word "dollars" insert the words "fourteen hundred," and in the same line insert the words "thirteen hundred."

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Virginia send his amendments to the Clerk's desk to be reported?

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAMB. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman did not offer an amendment at the time to insert, in line 21, page 4, after the word "typewriters" the words "eight hundred and forty dollars."

Mr. LAMB. I have done that previously.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman asked unanimous consent when points of order were being made, but it was not agreed to.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to page 4, line 21, to make it "$840."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 4, line 21, after the word "at" insert the words "eight hundred and forty."

Mr. MANN. So that it will read "$840 each."

The CLERK. So that it will read "$840 each."

The amendment was considered and agreed to.

Mr. LAMB. On the same page, line 23, after the word "dollars," I move to amend by inserting the word "one" in place of "two."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 23, after the word "dollars," insert the word "one," so that it will read "one assistant foreman of division."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAMB. In line 25 I move to strike out the word "each" and insert "one assistant foreman of division, $1,400."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 25, strike out the word "each" and insert "one assistant foreman of division at $1,400."

The CHAIRMAN. In line 23, should not there be a change of the word "two" to "one"?

Mr. MANN. That has already been made.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The amendment was considered and agreed to.

Mr. LEVER. In line 24, I move to amend by striking out the word "foremen" and inserting the word "foreman."

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 24, strike out the "e" in the word "foremen" and insert an "a," making it read "foreman."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAMB. Now, Mr. Chairman, in the same line 25, page 4, I move to amend by striking out the word "five" and inserting the word "three," so that it will read "one thousand three hundred" instead of "one thousand five hundred."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 25, after the word "lithographer," insert the words "one thousand three hundred."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAMB. On page 5, line 11, I move to change the word "three" to the word "two," so that it will read "$1,200" instead of "$1,300."

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 11, after the word "engineer," insert the words "one thousand two hundred."

The amendment was considered and agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contingent expenses, Weather Bureau: For fuel, lights, repairs, and other expenses for the care, preservation, and improvement of the public buildings and grounds of the Weather Bureau in the city of Washington; for stationery and blank books, furniture and repairs to same, and freight and express charges; for subsistence, care, and purchase of horses and vehicles, and repairs of harness, for official purposes only; for advertising, dry goods, twine, mats, oils, paints, glass, lumber, hardware, ice, washing towels, and other miscellaneous supplies and expenses not otherwise provided for in the city of Washington, $25,000.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I desire to reserve a point of order against that paragraph and to make the point of order against the words, in line 8, "and improvement." I reserve the point as to those words in order that the chairman or any other gentleman who may desire may be heard on the point of order.

Mr. MANN. What is the point of order?

Mr. CULLOP. My point of order is that the words "and improvement" should go out, because they are new and have not been used and is without authority of law.

Mr. MANN. But that is not stating the point of order, with all due respect to the gentleman. What is the point of order?

Mr. CULLOP. That there is no law authorizing them to go ahead and make improvements ad libitum.

Mr. MANN. I know; but that is not a point of order. Does the gentleman base his claim that it should go out on the fact it is new? That is not a point of order.

Mr. CULLOP. It is new legislation I have been undertaking to prevent, I wish to say to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. But the fact it is new legislation is not a point of order. Under what provision of the rules does the gentleman make the point of order on this proposition? I am asking the gentleman in good faith.

Mr. LAMB. I admit this is new language.

Mr. MANN. But it is not subject to the point of order.

Mr. LAMB. I do not think so either. The words "and improvement" appearing in this line is in fact new language. This change is essential in view of the decision of the comptroller's office that no change can be made in Government buildings that is not strictly in line of repairs unless the same be specifically provided for by Congress.

It frequently becomes necessary to cut doorways, build partitions, and so forth, and this is not possible at the present time, as it would come under the head of improvements instead of repairs, and therefore specific language for the purpose is sought. There is no change in the amount of this appropriation. Here is what Mr. Moore, the Chief of the Weather Bureau, says about it:

Mr. MOORE. There you see is a slight change in phraseology by the insertion of the words "and improvement." Well, now, this change is asked in view of a decision that under the present act the Weather Bureau is without authority to make any changes in its buildings that are not strictly in line with repairs.

Then he goes on to give an illustration to show the necessity for these words being inserted.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the Chair ask the gentleman from Virginia whether this is claimed to be a continuation of work already begun?

Mr. LAMB. Yes; surely.

Mr. CULLOP. I want to be heard on the point of order before the Chair rules.

Mr. LAMB. That is all I have to say, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CULLOP. Now, Mr. Chairman, the objection I have to this language, sustaining the point I have made, is this: I want to read two or three lines in order that the committee may catch the force of this proposition:

For fuel, light, repairs, and other expenses for the care, preservation, and improvement of the public buildings and grounds of the Weather Bureau.

What limit is there to the improvement? You have simply turned the matter over to the head of that department to make just such improvements as his fastidious taste may suggest to him. I want the money that is appropriated by this bill to go to benefit the farmers of this country and not for some officeholder to build him magnificent quarters in which he is to be located.

Mr. LAMB. Will my friend allow an interruption there? This is not for building purposes; this is for changing a building, cutting a doorway here and a window there, which they can not do under the language as at present employed.

Mr. CULLOP. I beg the gentleman's pardon. They had the authority under the old appropriation bill, and, with this language out, they have the authority under this bill to make such repairs, but this leaves the extent of the improvements open to these officials—

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Will the gentleman permit? I want to suggest to the gentleman if he does not think that with this language in they can go to work and build an addition to the building?

Mr. CULLOP. Certainly, they could.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. In the way of improvement.

Mr. CULLOP. Yes; whatever their fastidious taste, as I said, may suggest in the way of improvement. You have given them that authority. I want the money to go to the benefit of the farmers of the country, to the agriculturists and not to the officeholder in a department where this gives them ample authority to expend it without any limitation whatever. That is my objection to the insertion of this language.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I think I can satisfy my friend on that point. This applies to Washington. To show you that there can be no such abuse as you imagine in this case, when I asked Mr. Moore the question he said:

You will see there could not be any abuse, because our total appropriation is $25,000, and it is nearly all taken up for other purposes, and that the only thing we would be enabled to do would be to make needed changes.

And the appropriation from which such improvements will be made outside of Washington is $97,500, and the greater part of this sum is necessary to pay rents.

Mr. CULLOP. Oh, I hope that such an argument as that would not be an inducement to the chairman of the committee to insert that language. That might mean a million-dollar improvement under this $25,000 appropriation. Such an improvement might be started and then come back here to the next Congress and say that the work had been begun and that we must not wait, and consequently we would have to appropriate the money to carry it out. It is against that kind of a practice that I am taking this precaution here to-day.

Mr. LAMB. The gentleman imagines an impossibility. He can not state anywhere where that has been done or ever will be done.

Mr. CULLOP. There is nothing here to prevent it. I know the policy has been to get something started by a small appropriation, and nobody but the taxpayer knows just where it ends. And when you give that kind of license, as you are giving in this, you are opening the door to the perpetration of very great extravagance, and for that reason I am opposed to it. Instead of improving the buildings in Washington, I want to improve the business back in the country, where the men have to make the money to pay the taxes to run the Government. It is for that reason I make the point of order.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the point of order, if the Chair desires any further statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, the language of the present law reads:

For fuel, lights, repairs, and other expenses for the care and preservation of the public buildings and grounds of the Weather Bureau in the city of Washington.

The committee amendment strikes out:

For repair.

And inserts the words:

An improvement.

And I make the point now, Mr. Chairman, that the point of order is not well taken, for the reason that the language inserted by the committee is to permit the continuance of work now under way. And I think the Chair is familiar with the long line of rulings and precedents.

The CHAIRMAN. What work now under way?

Mr. LEVER. Work on the matter of public buildings in the city of Washington; the existence of the weather building itself, to take care of it, to preserve it from rotting down, to cut a window through it, or to fix a lock—all that, I take it, is in line with the decisions.

Mr. RODDENBERRY and Mr. MANN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. RODDENBERRY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to lodge a point of order against the word "improvement."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is now considering a point of order.

Mr. RODDENBERRY. I desire to lodge a point of order against this on a ground that has not been stated, and if the present ruling the Chair will make will have the effect of producing a waiver in that connection—

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. In the opinion of the Chair the words "an improvement" are entirely too broad. They do not appear to refer to existing work and they are not appropriate for that purpose. And the statement of the gentleman from South Carolina on the provisions of the previous appropriation bill seems to bear out that idea. While the amount carried is small and might not justify all the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] has said, it is unquestionably true the words are entirely too broad, and the point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. All that the Chair has said may be true, but will the Chair hear me a moment on that?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Supposing the item should read:

For the improvement of the public buildings and grounds of the Weather Bureau in the city of Washington.

Would that be subject to a point of order? That is a question. Now, it is quite competent, where the Government owns a public building, to provide for an addition to that public building. It is not subject to a point of order. You can provide for a new building there. You could provide over here a new building to go in between the two wings of the agricultural building. It would not be subject to a point of order.

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] allow an interruption?

Mr. MANN. I will yield for a question.

Mr. CULLOP. I understand that the Chair has ruled on the point of order. Now, is the gentleman offering an amendment?

Mr. MANN. I am addressing the Chair, with the Chairman's permission.

Mr. CULLOP. I want to get the drift of the gentleman's position.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is occupying the position of asking for a hearing.

Mr. CULLOP. He is asking for a new trial—or a recall. Very good.

Mr. MANN. Now, it is quite certain as to the public grounds of Washington. It is not subject to a point of order to make an appropriation for the planting of trees on the public grounds, or for putting any necessary hedges on the public grounds, or for putting any necessary paths on the public grounds. Those are improvements of the public grounds. Those items are not subject to a point of order. I do not see how it can be construed that a provision for the improvement of the public buildings is subject to a point of order. Ordinarily it is subject to being refused, in the discretion of the legislative body, without being more definite.

The gentleman from Indiana in arguing his point of order was arguing in the main as to the discretion of Congress that something might be done that ought not to be done. That is not a question constituting a point of order. I do not see how you can say that where you provide a new building to be attached to a building, no limit of cost to be placed on the building, on the new building on these grounds, we have not the right under the rules to provide for a new building here, or any other improvement that we please, there being no limitation upon the cost of the buildings and grounds.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say in reply to the argument of the gentleman from Illinois that under section 3752 of Hinds' Precedents there appears a ruling on April 10, 1900, to the effect that an appropriation for a new building on the Agricultural Department grounds was subject to a point of order, appearing in an appropriation bill.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but, Mr. Chairman, an addition to an existing building is not subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. That is very true.

Mr. MANN. This is an improvement to the building. This would not authorize a new building on the grounds.

The CHAIRMAN. The language used in this appropriation bill, the simple words "an improvement," in the opinion of the Chair, would justify anything that was classed as an improvement of real estate, and certainly it would be a very broad use of language.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I would like to inquire if the Chair has ruled on this question?

The CHAIRMAN. That being true, if the language is limited to a specific building or specific repairs, the point of order would not lie.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend—

Mr. CULLOP. We are not through with the point of order. I have reserved a point of order on the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The ruling of the Chair is that the point of order is sustained. Are there further points of order?

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I was going to say that I had reserved a point of order against the whole section, and I now withdraw that point of order.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the gentlemen in charge of this bill a question. I see a provision in this bill "for the subsistence, care, and purchase of horses and vehicles, and the repair of harness, for official purposes only." I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill how many horses are used for official purposes?

Mr. LAMB. I reckon they are all used for purposes connected with the bureau.

Mr. CULLOP. How many are there?

Mr. LAMB. I do not know.

Mr. CULLOP. How many vehicles are there?

Mr. LAMB. I think the Chief of the Weather Bureau has one carriage and one horse, and he takes care of it himself. Then they have got some horses and wagons over there for other purposes, I do not know what. But we are bound to trust somebody and put confidence in somebody. We can not go to these officers and see how many horses they have there, and how much feed the horses get every night.

Mr. CULLOP. I understand that; but the gentleman should make inquiry as to the number, and so on. What I would like to know is, How many horses are constantly kept by this department, and how many vehicles? I would like to know that. I think the public has the right to know how many horses are kept for strictly official business, and how many officials, if any, are riding around using these in connection with their social matters and social duties; and for that reason I am unwilling to appropriate money for that purpose if that is the case, and that is why I asked the question. I am willing to appropriate money for the purpose of maintaining vehicles, horses, and carriages to be used in the discharge of public duties, but not for social affairs, and that is why I asked this question.

Mr. CANDLER. Under this provision there is no appropriation of a single, solitary cent except for horses and vehicles and necessary harness for official purposes, and official purposes only. Now, the gentleman says he is willing to make an appropriation for that purpose. That is the only purpose that is contemplated or named in this provision.

Mr. CULLOP. How many are required?

Mr. CANDLER. Those that are necessary for the discharge of the duties of the department, no more and no less. Just how many there are I do not know. I do not suppose there is a man in the House who does know. The gentleman himself might go down there and count them if he is so inclined.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, we are legislating here for a large number of people, and we have the right to know, and the people have the right to know, just about what this money is appropriated for and what is being maintained with the appropriation that is made. It is for that reason that I ask this question, and I would like very much to have that information. I have understood through the press, and through some matters that developed a short time ago in the Senate, that a large number of vehicles with liveried drivers and fine harnesses and horses drawing beautiful equipages were used largely for social duties by public officials, and not for the transaction of public business. If any of this is for that purpose, I am voting against every dollar proposed for such a purpose, and want it to be understood that I am contesting the passage of any appropriation bill giving a dollar for any such purpose.

Mr. CANDLER. I do not think there would be a member of this committee who would be in favor of appropriating a dollar of the people's money for carriages, or for vehicles, or for horses, or any purpose of that kind, in order to supply the officials of the Government simply for their pleasure.

A number of years ago this question came up in the House, and there was a very thorough investigation made, and it was discovered that there was some abuse along these lines. At that time this very provision that is now in this bill was adopted, and it has been enacted into law every year from then until now, limiting this to official business.

As was said by the chairman of the committee a moment ago, you have got to trust somebody. If you can not trust some of the officials of the Government; if you have to send some man around to count horses and see how many sets of harness there are and how many vehicles there are; if the Members of Congress are required to do that, then I am very sorry to know it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CULLOP. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more in which to conclude this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CULLOP. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER].

Mr. CANDLER. As I was saying, you have certainly got to trust some of the officials of the Government. If we have an official at the head of a great bureau of this Government who can not be trusted in the small and insignificant matter of simply buying enough horses and enough vehicles and enough harness to transact the official business and obey the law as it is written, if that is the standard of official integrity, I am disappointed, and knowing the distinguished gentleman who is the chief of this bureau, I do not believe that is his standard. I believe that he obeys the law and sticks to the letter of the law as it is written; that he is an honest and most excellent public official. [Applause.]

Mr. CULLOP. In reply to the gentleman from Mississippi, I want to say that I desire to congratulate him on succeeding in eliminating the abuses that have heretofore existed in that line.

Mr. LAMB. Right on that point I wish to say that I am informed that the Chief of the Weather Bureau owns his own carriage and horse, and furnishes them himself.

Mr. CULLOP. I do not doubt all that the gentleman assumes; that we ought to trust somebody. We are trusting somebody, but the trouble is that you have made no inquiry to get this information. Would it not have been well to have asked and obtained this information, and to have found what the one in charge of it had to say, and then rely upon that being true? What I am trying to find out is the number of these horses and carriages.

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLOP. Certainly.

Mr. LEVER. Of course, the gentleman from Indiana knows that we have in this House a committee charged with the duty of making the very investigation which he speaks of, and that it is now making that investigation into the Department of Agriculture. That committee is headed by the gentleman's colleague, Mr. Moss.

Mr. CULLOP. I am very glad to know that from the gentleman. I knew it already, but what I am trying to get at here is whether this committee, in making up this bill, made any inquiry about the use of the money appropriated for this particular purpose. That is the complaint. It seems no one did. Now, you are appropriating a large sum. Is it not a very dangerous plan of procedure to fail to know just what the money appropriated is to be used for?

If there are 20 horses maintained in that department, we ought to know it. If there are only 2, we ought to know it, so that when you go to the country you can tell the people that you made an inquiry and found out whether it was necessary or not. This is making a very dangerous precedent. With all deference to the gentlemen on the committee, for whom I have the very highest regard, I do not want, if I can prevent it, to have any abuse creep into this bill. For that reason I have made this inquiry, thinking perhaps I could get the information from some gentleman on the committee. Now, we are trusting some one when we take the testimony of a man that is at the head of that department. It is not necessary to send men down to look at these things, as gentlemen have said, but get the testimony here, so that when the country asks you for it you are there with the proof.

Mr. KONIG. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLOP. Yes.

Mr. KONIG. I would like to ask the gentleman if he has taken into consideration how many more teams and horses and vehicles would be necessary for the Weather Bureau to give us the weather we have had this last winter over that we had last? [Laughter.]

Mr. CULLOP. I am not an expert in that matter and therefore I can not hold myself out as one. But, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to making appropriation for the payment for things that we do not know how much there is of it, or very much about it, and for that reason I made the inquiry. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I object to the withdrawal of the pro forma amendment. I would like to inquire of the gentleman in charge of the bill if he knows how many towels were washed last year under the appropriation in this paragraph of the bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEVER. And I insist that the chairman give a definite reply.

Mr. MANN. I do not see how it is possible for Members of the House to vote intelligently under the appropriation, which might carry with it the right to wash innumerable towels, unless we know how many towels were washed. [Laughter.]

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that, from the experience of the last election, he ought to understand that it would have been better for him to have known, and his party to have known, more about that subject than he did know. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. I gave the Democracy more credit than to think that they changed the election on the question of towels and horses. [Laughter.]

Mr. CULLOP. The gentleman can not waive it aside on that proposition; that was one of the many things that led up to it. What was the condition in the Secretary of State's office, where the annual bill for shoeing four horses was $260? It was such abuses that led to the defeat of the Republican Party, and he can not waive it aside. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment is exhausted. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to that paragraph. On page 6, line 7, after the word "care," insert the word "and." On line 8, after the word "grounds," insert the words "and the improvement of the existing public building," so that it will then read "for fuel, lights, repairs, and other expenses for the care and preservation of the public buildings and grounds and of the improvement of the existing public buildings of the Weather Bureau in the city of Washington."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. CULLOP. What buildings are being improved there?

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman that I do not know, but the question of improvements came about through a statement from the Weather Bureau itself. The same thing applies to a number of other bureaus. They desired that in the Weather Bureau there should be cut a little passageway from one room into another, and the comptroller, passing upon this, said that he had no authority to do it. Of course, the Weather Bureau maintains a building in the city of Washington. I do not know how many they have. I do not know how many doors or windows are in it, but it was thought that this language was necessary to give authority to make minor improvements, which are necessary to any public building for that matter.

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman be willing to specify what improvements he wants in his amendment? If you leave it open generally, you are conferring too much authority and making great abuses possible.

Mr. LEVER. I concede that there is some force in the gentleman's statement, but will the gentleman accept this: "The necessary improvements of public buildings"?

Mr. CULLOP. That would leave it to the superintendent to determine what was necessary; one man might think it necessary and another might not.

Mr. LEVER. But do you not have to, as a matter of fact, leave the discretion in somebody, somewhere?

Mr. CULLOP. It is easy to specify what the improvement is. Mr. LEVER. Here is a question of boring a hole into a wall; are you going to specify that? Here is a question of stopping up a crack; are you going to specify that?

Mr. CULLOP. You have in this bill, and there is a provision in every one of them, the right to make necessary repairs. If that was a necessary repair, the authority is there given to do it; but if he is going to make some new and extensive improvement under your amendment he can do it, and that is why I am objecting to it.

Mr. LEVER. Let me repeat what the comptroller has held what you can not do under the present language.

This following is a statement by Prof. Moore, of the bureau:

The observer lived on the premises, as observers do in nearly all the buildings. I directed our accounting officer to cut down one of the windows and put in a door. He immediately came back and said he could not do it—that the comptroller's decision will not allow you to alter that building.

Now there is the situation. I have no fear of any abuse of this power. If I had, I would be as much opposed as the gentleman, perhaps.

Mr. CULLOP. Well, a good way to prevent the abuse of power is to put safeguards around the matter, so that it can not be abused. Now, it is very easy to specify the changes which are designed to be made there, and then you would not leave it open. The gentleman confesses that there is merit in the objection I have made.

Mr. LEVER. I confess there is merit in the proposition from the gentleman's viewpoint, but I do not confess there is merit in it. I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 6, line 7, after the word "care," insert the word "and," and in line 8, after the word "grounds," insert the words "and improvement of existing public buildings," so that it will read "of the public buildings and grounds and improvement of existing public buildings of the Weather Bureau in the city of Washington."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 4, and in lines 14 and 15 change from $3,250 to $3,000, leaving out the $250.

Mr. MANN. That has already been done.

Mr. LAMB. No.

Mr. MANN. The Chair sustained the point of order to the words "two hundred and fifty dollars" I understood at the time. That was the statement made.

Mr. LAMB. Well, I want to change in conformity to it.

Mr. MANN. With the words "two hundred and fifty dollars" it would read "three thousand dollars."

Mr. LAMB. That is what it ought to read.

The CHAIRMAN. This is a matter for construction—

Mr. MANN. It depends upon what the Chair struck out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustained the point of order to the amount stated, but in case of any doubt about the matter, the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia will certainly be in order.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection whatever to the amendment, but I noted at the time what the Chair stated, that he sustained the point of order to the words "two hundred and fifty dollars."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to return to page 4 for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 4, lines 14 and 15, after the word "Bureau," insert the words "three thousand dollars."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For fuel, gas, electricity, freight and express charges, furniture, stationery, and all other necessary supplies and miscellaneous expenses, $104,500.

Mr. RODDENBERRY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the words "five hundred," in line 14, page 7, the amount being an increase not authorized by existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's point of order is against the words "five hundred"?

Mr. RODDENBERRY. Yes, sir; against the words "five hundred."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire what the point of order is.

Mr. RODDENBERRY. That it is an increase of appropriations not authorized by law. I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, if the Chair desires any argument on the point of order—

The CHAIRMAN. No; the Chair is prepared to rule.

Mr. LEVER. I do not think it is necessary to argue it at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is unable to see that an increase in a lump appropriation for these necessary expenses would be subject to the point of order.

Mr. RODDENBERRY. The item is for fuel, gas, electricity, freight and express charges, and so forth. The current appropriation is $104,000, the identical items carried in the paragraph, and this increase is not authorized by law.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair an appropriation bill can increase or diminish that amount from year to year. The point of order is overruled.

The Clerk read as follows:

For instruments, shelters, apparatus, storm-warning towers, and repairs thereto, $36,500.

Mr. RODDENBERRY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the words "six thousand five hundred dollars" and insert in lieu thereof the words "five thousand dollars." Mr. Chairman, the object of the motion is to confine the present appropriation to an amount not in excess of the previous appropriation. The appropriation for the current year is $35,000 and for the same items, and it may be that there are some contingencies and some reasons why this item should be increased in that amount.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, this is simply an increase of $1,500. I asked a question about it, and the answer was that it is for the purchase of instruments required in equipment of additional stations.

He said it was necessary in order to buy a few more implements to equip some of these stations, and he asked $1,500 more, and we gave it to him.

Mr. RODDENBERRY. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For rent of offices and repairs and improvements to buildings now completed and located outside of the District of Columbia, and care and preservation of grounds, including construction of necessary outbuildings and sidewalks on public streets abutting Weather Bureau grounds, $98,000.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I desire to reserve a point of order against the paragraph and make the point of order against the words "and improvements" in line 18. However, I reserve the point of order so that gentlemen may be heard. It now reads:

For rent of offices and repairs and improvements to buildings now completed and located outside of the District of Columbia.

I make the point of order against the words "and improvements."

Mr. LAMB. The same reasons apply that we gave before.

Mr. CULLOP. The language is too broad and is not authorized by law.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For investigations in climatology and evaporation, including the erection of temporary buildings for living quarters for observers, for river, rain, snow, ice, crop, evaporation, aerial, storm, hurricane, and other observations, warnings, and reports, and for pay of special observers and display men, $115,000.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 8, end of line 13, by adding the following:

"Four thousand dollars of said amount shall be used in improving and extending the Weather Bureau Service located at Amarillo, Tex."

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. In reference to this matter I will explain my amendment by first reading the following letter, dated February 9, 1912, from the Chief of the Weather Bureau of the United States, relating to the extension of the Weather Bureau service at Amarillo, Tex. I have been urging this department for some time to extend this service to this large town in my district, as is shown by the following letter, referred to above, viz:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
WEATHER BUREAU, OFFICE OF THE CHIEF,
Washington, D. C., February 9, 1912.

Hon. JOHN H. STEPHENS, M. C.,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: With further reference to your letter of February 2, 1912, concerning an extension of the Weather Bureau service at Amarillo, Tex., and my reply of February 7, 1912, I have the honor to inform you that it will require at least $4,000 per annum to extend the service at Amarillo so as to provide for the issuing of a daily weather map and a wider distribution of forecasts and warnings throughout the Panhandle district. This sum should be added to the appropriation for general expenses, Weather Bureau, and as this appropriation is divided into suballotments the $4,000 should be apportioned as follows:

For the employment of professors of meteorology, inspectors, district forecasters, local forecasters, etc.	$2,000
For fuel, gas, electricity, freight, express charges, furniture, stationery, etc.	500
For instruments, shelters, apparatus, etc.	250
For telephone rentals and for telegraphing, telephoning, etc.	1,250

The agricultural bill containing appropriations for the Weather Bureau has already been reported to the House, and in order to accomplish what you desire at Amarillo additional funds must be provided. I inclose a copy of this bill in which I have indicated the necessary changes.

Very respectfully,

WILLIS L. MOORE,
Chief United States Weather Bureau.

Mr. Chairman, the small amount being now expended for the service at this point was because of an insufficient appropriation, and I desire to secure this special amount of $4,000 by this amendment. It would certainly be germane. Amarillo is situated between 300 and 400 miles from any other weather station, the nearest stations being at Santa Fe, N. Mex., on the west, Pueblo, Colo., and Fort Dodge, Kans., on the north, and Abilene and Fort Worth and Oklahoma City on the south and east. This vast territory is now covered by this small station. We have about 10 railroads running into Amarillo, and it is the commercial center of that territory. If this bureau service were extended so as to cover this large territory it would be of great advantage to its citizens, and it would take $4,000 from this lump-sum appropriation and specifically direct the Weather Bureau to expend that amount at this one point, the city of Amarillo.

Mr. LAMB. I think if the gentleman from Texas will see the Chief of the Weather Bureau he could get this service there, for the reason that we gave some $15,000 or $20,000 increase in this bill, the very object of which was to extend this service at three or four places, and, in my judgment, this is one of those places. I believe he can get this work done with a part of the amount of money that is here appropriated.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. This letter comes directly from the Chief of the Weather Bureau on the subject, and he said he would be glad to extend the service if necessary, but he suggested that it should be added to the appropriation. If the increased appropriation for this purpose carried in this bill is sufficient to cover this Amarillo appropriation, then I will withdraw the amendment, and I fully rely on the statement of the chairman of the committee that it does cover this matter.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I will ask the gentleman if they have now a building at Amarillo, Tex.?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. We have a building, but it is small and insufficient.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Do you not think that the authority in the preceding paragraph, on page 7, where there is an appropriation for repairs and improvements to buildings now completed and located outside of the District of Columbia, would permit the Chief of the Weather Bureau to make that improvement?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think it would, but if there is an additional amount added to the bill for that purpose I would be assured more fully that my appropriation would be granted; they have the right now, under the law, to make these improvements, but have denied my requests for want of funds.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. "Improvements to buildings now completed and located outside of the District of Columbia" might take that in.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then, Mr. Chairman, on the assurance of the chairman and the gentleman from Illinois that our bureau will be extended, I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the maintenance of a printing office in the city of Washington, including the purchase of necessary supplies and materials for printing weather maps, bulletins, circulars, forms, and other publications, and for pay of additional assistant foremen, proof readers, compositors, pressmen, lithographers, and folders and feeders, when necessary, $16,750.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee why it is necessary to maintain a printing office in the Weather Bureau, in the Agricultural Department, for this purpose, and why the work is not done in the Government Printing Office?

Mr. LAMB. A great deal of the department's work is done in the Government Printing Office, but it is necessary to have this office at the Weather Bureau for the printing of weather maps and the like.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Do they have to have it there for the purpose for which this appropriation is made?

Mr. LAMB. Yes, sir. Necessarily they have to have the printing office there, because they have to do the work so rapidly.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Can they do the work more rapidly down there than in the Government Printing Office?

Mr. LAMB. Yes, sir. We asked that question and inquired about that, and we were informed that it was necessary. This branch printing office was established for the printing of maps and bulletins and circulars and other publications, and the answer to the inquiries we made respecting this item was that it was necessary to do the work there. The bulk of the work of the department, however, is done at the Government Printing Office.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. This part of the work is not done at the Government Printing Office?

Mr. LAMB. No, sir. There is no duplication of the work.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Why is it not done at the Government Printing Office instead of at the Weather Bureau?

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman that it is not done at the Government Printing Office for the reason that the experts, in making up the reports from all over the country and getting them out quickly, find it necessary to have all their machinery at hand in order to scatter them throughout the country rapidly, and they also lithograph their maps there. To have that work done at the Government Printing Office would require entirely too much time.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] withdraws his pro forma amendment. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to inquire of the gentleman in charge of the bill, What is the object of architects in this Bureau of Animal Industry? I see two architects are provided for in that bureau.

Mr. LAMB. The chief of the bureau stated to us that he had a quantity of work to do there. What page is that on?

Mr. GARNER. On page 9.

Mr. LAMB. They draw their plans for public buildings, and so forth.

Mr. GARNER. I did not know but that these architects were used to draw plans of stools to be used by farmers while milking cows, or to make frames for horses, or something of that kind.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I think the bureau does make plans and specifications for dairy farms. I am not sure that that is true, but I think that is where these architects are required. The plans are furnished free of charge to any farmer who desires to build a dairy barn.

Mr. LEVER. That is true.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. If a man will write to the department, giving the number of cows he proposes to house in his barn, the architect will furnish him free of charge with plans and specifications for building that barn. I understand also it is the same way with a silo. I take it that is the work on which these architects are used.

Mr. LAMB. I will answer the gentleman's inquiry in the language of Dr. Melvin, when we asked him about this:

Dr. MELVIN. We have used them in our own work in planning and constructing buildings; and we have one architect, this one at $2,000, who passes on the plans for the building and remodeling of packing houses. For instance, if a new packing house is to be built, we request that the plans be first submitted so as to ascertain whether we could approve the establishment as to its sanitary arrangements; and in the remodeling of them we ask for plans for the same reason.

You see the extent of the work, it covers the whole country.

Mr. GARNER. I understand that, but I was trying to get at what an architect's duties are. I understand the $2,000 man is to suggest, in case they can persuade the packers to submit their plans and specifications to them, improvements with reference to sanitary conditions. I presume the $900 man is for the purpose of drawing plans and specifications for a farmer's dairy, or something of that kind, free of charge.

Mr. LAMB. I will say to my friend—

Mr. GARNER. These architects evidently are very efficient men. They must be at these munificent salaries.

Mr. LAMB. They are doing some of this work out here at Arlington, Beltsville, and Bethesda, or wherever ordered by the chief of this bureau in the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Possibly the high-priced man is the one who has gone to the packing houses and suggested that they put a window in the refrigerating room.

Mr. GARNER. I wish to call attention to the fact that for work of this character this is evidently a very small salary. I do not imagine you will get architects at $2,000 and $900 a year who are capable of giving anybody plans and specifications that will not have to be referred to some other architect having more capacity.

Mr. MANN. Oh, these are very competent men.

Mr. GARNER. I withdraw the point, Mr. Chairman.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. PEPPER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4978. An act to supplement and amend the act entitled "An act to incorporate the North River Bridge Co. and to authorize the construction of a bridge and approaches at New York City across the Hudson River, to regulate commerce in and over such bridge between the States of New York and New Jersey, and to establish such bridge a military and post road," approved July 11, 1890.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 4551) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the building of a dam across the Savannah River at or near the mouth of Stevens Creek, between the counties of Edgefield, S. C., and Columbia, Ga.," approved August 5, 1909.

AGRICULTURE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

General expenses, Bureau of Animal Industry: For carrying out the provisions of the act approved May 29, 1884, establishing a Bureau of Animal Industry, and the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1891, providing for the safe transport and humane treatment of export cattle from the United States to foreign countries, and for other purposes; the act approved August 30, 1890, providing for the importation of animals into the United States, and for other purposes; and the provisions of the act of May 9, 1902, extending the inspection of meats to process butter, and providing for the inspection of factories, marking of packages, etc.; and the provisions of the act approved February 2, 1903, to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to more effectually suppress and prevent the spread of contagious and infectious diseases of live stock, and for other purposes; and also the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1905, to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to establish and maintain quarantine districts, to permit and regulate the movement of cattle and other live stock therefrom, and for other purposes; and for carrying out the provisions of the act of June 29, 1906, entitled "An act to prevent cruelty to animals while in transit by railroad or other means of transportation," and to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to collect and disseminate information concerning live stock, dairy, and other animal products; to prepare and disseminate reports on animal industry; to employ and pay from the appropriation herein made as many persons in the city of Washington or elsewhere as he may deem necessary; to purchase in the open market samples of all tuberculin serums, antitoxins, or analogous products, of foreign or domestic manufacture, which are sold in the United States, for the detection, prevention, treatment, or cure of diseases of domestic animals, to test the same, and to disseminate the results of said tests in such manner as he may deem best; to purchase and destroy diseased or exposed animals or quarantine the same whenever in his judgment essential to prevent the spread of pleuropneumonia, tuberculosis, or other diseases of animals from one State to another, as follows.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting after the word "another," at the end of line 21, page 12, the following:

"And indemnify the owners of milk cows condemned under section 2 of the act of Congress approved March 2, 1895, and the regulations of the District of Columbia in relation thereto."

Mr. LAMB. I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. LEWIS. I hope the gentleman will withhold it until I explain the amendment.

Mr. LAMB. I will withhold it.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, the amendment is addressed to a situation that I think ought to interest the Members of this House. In the operations of the Agricultural Department it has eventuated that Washington and its suburbs have been particularly made an experiment station. There are applied to the dairy supplies of this city tests and regulations which are altogether unusual in this country. One of the tests developed under the care of the department has been the so-called tuberculin test, which is now applied to the dairy supply of the city of Washington in a discriminating way. It is this discrimination that the amendment is intended to correct.

Dairy cows within the District of Columbia that are found objectionable under this tuberculin test are made the subject of compensation to their owners. The owners of dairy cows that happen to be beyond the line of the District, but are still District dairy cows in the most exclusive sense are denied compensation when their cows are condemned under the tuberculin test. The object of this amendment is to correct an absolutely unjustifiable discrimination of the character I have named.

Now, a word or two about the merits of the proposition itself.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LEWIS. I do.

Mr. MADDEN. Is not the condemnation of tuberculous cattle strictly a State matter, and does not the State in all cases pay for all cattle condemned under such conditions?

Mr. LEWIS. It does not.

Mr. MADDEN. Ought it to be assumed by the Government of the United States?

Mr. LEWIS. It is assumed by the Government of the United States with regard to dairy cows in the District of Columbia. There is no reason why the Government should discriminate between the dairy cow within the District and the dairy cow just over the line, when that dairy cow is devoted exclusively to supplying the needs of the District of Columbia.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman allow a further question?

Mr. LEWIS. Surely.

Mr. MADDEN. Would not the argument of the gentleman apply to every State in the Union if any dairy products were sent into the District of Columbia and the District officials were to condemn the cattle from which these dairy products came—from the State of Pennsylvania, Illinois, Missouri, or any other State? The amendment of the gentleman would make the Government of the United States responsible in every case, would it not?

Mr. LEWIS. Exactly; but the facts do not happen to correspond with the gentleman's assumed state of affairs. Milk is to-day supplied to the city of Washington from points as remote as Pennsylvania, and I think points as remote as 200 or 300 miles distant. In this instance of the remote dairy the regulations of the District of Columbia in reference to tuberculin tests are not employed. But, in the distance embraced within 20 miles of the District line, the District inspectors go over the line and employ this very insufficient and indeterminate test to the dairy cows; and if they happen to be over the line deny compensation. If they happen to be in the District within the line they give compensation out of the funds of the Federal Treasury under regulation approved and carried out by the Agricultural Department.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks that the time of the gentleman from Maryland be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, now you have three methods in reference to this matter. The dairy cow that is remote to which this test does not apply; second, the dairy within 20 or 30 miles of the Capitol, to which it does apply and to which it denies compensation; and third, those within the line to which it applies the test, and if the tests are destructive renders compensation.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS. Certainly.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I would like to inquire by what authority the animals outside of the District are slaughtered?

Mr. LEWIS. By a method of inferential Federal authority.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Federal authority?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes; the act of 1895 governing the admission of milk into this city. The gentleman smiles, but I think an explanation will remove the smile. It so happens that within 20 miles the dairy supplies have existed for a generation before that act was passed, dairies employed exclusively in supplying this city with milk; being denied markets elsewhere on account of the natural location. The effect of the act of Congress, if the tuberculin test is applied, is to deny admission for their milk to this city and at the same time deny the compensation which is given by the Government to cows within the District line.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. As I understand it, the Federal authorities have nothing to do with cows outside the District.

Mr. LEWIS. The Federal authority has approved of the regulation by which cows are disqualified and have provided funds by which the cows in the District of Columbia are compensated for. They are not paid for out of the District fund but out of Federal funds, out of the Treasury of the United States.

This amendment is intended to correct a pure discrimination as to cows condemned that are absolutely necessary to the dairy supply of this city.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LEWIS. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Can the gentleman inform the committee what is the practice in other parts of the country where cattle are condemned as being afflicted with pleuropneumonia or any other infectious disease? Who pays the expense of that?

Mr. LEWIS. I am not sufficiently informed to authoritatively advise the gentleman, but I do not think any such situation has developed as is developed in the city of Washington.
